Don't feel bad Tamara. I think that's the third year in a row that signage hasn't been ideal on Leg 1. I'll speak to the race coordinator when I see him today at Exchange 6.

I cant watch again now on train and I forget the script exactly but it suggested they walked away with billions from havng done illegal and immoral lending. Cant remember if they used word subprime.

I did skim some news clips and it appears default rates on their stuff was high (herb says not more so than others) and the losses were key to almsot wachovia failure -- athough herb emphasizes that they were only one of the institutions problems. so we should try to understand these facts and get them right in pushback.

I reached out to martin eakes too and will try to reach him. In some ways they (esp their california office) are most knowledgable and in best position to say what characteristics of golden west portfolio was and why this was unfair. Not sure their comfort zone.

Did herb sound like he' d' talked to martin?

I suspect there is a movement of wachovia employees who are angry and may be driving some of this.

For some reason I lost audio on my laptop. So I haven't heard what they said in the skit. Were they portrayed as subprime lenders? They didn't do any subprimes. I did see should be shot label. Talked to Herb. They are obviosly upset. Weird that snl should pick them out. They did soros too so maybe this is one of those right wing writers ala ABC 9/11.

At any rate, we should figure out a way to push back.

My impression had always been that while world savings/golden west led in the area of adjustible rate mortgages they did so with pretty conservative underwriting and underwrote to the fully indexed rate. That is certainly not the impression on gets from the current media and I tried to figure out how i know that and i cant find anything to that effect in a quick review. Whatever the case there, given their role in CRL and advocacy for sound underwriting practices the charactchure (sp?) is unfair.

Subject:	Tomorrow's meeting

John,

For the meeting tomorrow, here are some of the basic's I thought we should review.

City Meetings

The proposed format for the meetings will be as follows:

A donor meeting presentation with approx 30 to 50 potential funders who have the capacity to contribute $100,000 or more. The thought again is to do a presentation where:

Rob McKay welcomes everyone and turns it over to John
John Podesta does a thorough presentation of the role and goals of The Fund for America
Field Presentation is done by Anna Burger or Martin Frost
Messaging Presentation is done by Paul Begala or Tom Matzzie
Mary Pat Bonner explains the fundraising campaign

This meeting is followed by a small dinner of approx 10 to 20 potential funders. These dinners will be held at one table. The will be informal discussions with individuals who have the capability of contributing $1M or more to The Fund for America

We should confirm the format of the presentation

We should confirm the Slides we want to use for the presentation (Mike Berkowitz will send a copy of both the presentation you gave and the AV presentation from the Alliance meeting under separate cover)

We should review the individuals who have been invited to the events and small dinners in each city. Note: The individuals who we are trying to schedule for private meetings with you are the same individuals we have invited to the small dinners. we are trying to schedule individual meetings with the ones who can't attend these dinners. (Beth Eagle will send these invite lists to you under separate cover).

Current Commitments and Cash Flow

Soros: $5M to $10M -- Prepared to move $2.5M in the next 2 weeks

Lewis: $5M -- Prepared to move $5M by January 15 directly to field groups

Bing: $5M to $10M -- Prepared to move $5M in the next few weeks

SEIU: $5M to $10M -- Determining where they are putting that $$

Abraham: $1M -- How soon can we ask him to move this money

Sillerman: $1M -- Will move at least 1/2 before the end of the year

Tsakapolis: $1M -- Will move part now

Buell: $1M likely --

We need to determine in this first phase which groups count and for how much. I need us to establish goals and cash deadlines in order to do cash flow projections.

I am sure there may be some other items that you would like to discuss. I just wanted to take a moment to review these with you so that we could start on the same page. I look forward to talking to you tomorrow. Please let me know if these is other information you need for this meeting.

Thanks,

MP

Hi John,

Happy Sunday. Finally some snow in Tahoe!

I thought you might like to see the invite for our school/student privacy summit that we are holding in DC on Monday Feb 24. If you have any interest in speaking, we will give you a featured role... And we would also welcome anyone from the WH to join. We are also expecting Senators like Ed Markey and Angus King to join, and Joel Benenson will lay out the latest polling data on privacy. Btw, we will probably announce major CA legislation beforehand.

I spoke at length with David Simas over the weekend about ConnectEd and we discussed all that we will be doing on that score... Which is very exciting. I would merely add that we can't do this critical wiring/infrastructure effort without developing clear school data privacy protections at the same time.

I look forward to seeing you in DC in a couple of weeks, and I'm happy to chat before then. All Steyers send their very best to you and Mary... And bless the rain!

Jim

THE ANNENBERG RETREAT AT SUNNYLANDS

common sense media

The Annenberg Retreat at Sunnylands & Common Sense Media invite you to our School Privacy Zone Summit

Monday, February 24, 2014
noon to 4:30*
Pew D.C. Conference Center
901 E Street N.W.
Washington D.C.

As our nation's schools embrace online platforms, mobile technologies, and cloud computing to enhance and personalize learning, we need to ensure that schoolchildren can benefit from these powerful education technologies while protecting their sensitive personal information. The School Privacy Zone Summit will bring together more than 100 of the nation's educators, industry leaders, policymakers, parents, and others. The goal is to engage these key stakeholders in a constructive conversation to develop core principles, best practices, regulatory and other measures to support connected classrooms that respect and safeguard schoolchildren's privacy.

Confirmed speakers include Education Secretary Arne Duncan; Joel Klein, Amplify CEO & former Chancellor NYC Dept. of Education; Edmodo General Counsel Aden Fine; FTC Commissioner Julie Brill; former FTC Chairman Jon Leibowitz; Jeff Mao, Learning Technology Policy Director, Maine Dept. of Education; Joel Reidenberg, Microsoft Visiting Professor of Information Technology Policy, Princeton University and more.

More information is available on the Common Sense Media School Privacy Zone page.

Space is limited. Please RSVP by Tuesday, February 18, 2014.

The House passed a bill 289-137 to suspend the program allowing Syrian and Iraqi refugees into the country until national-security agencies determine they don't post a security risk. Forty-seven Democrats joined 242 Republicans in favor of the bill, which could create a majority to override President Barack Obama's threat to veto the measure. After the vote, Labott tweeted, "Statue of Liberty bows head in anguish."

Friend,

Pat Quinn has always been the underdog.

Four years ago, a lot of people wrote us off -- but they were wrong. A few months ago, some people did the same again.

But thanks to people like you, this race is neck-and-neck going into the home stretch.

This election is shaping up to be a nail-biter -- donate $5 or more before our final quarterly deadline to help make sure it goes our way.

Believe me: I've known the Governor for a long time. No matter how tough things get -- how down in the polls he is or how many pundits count him out -- he never loses faith in the power of people like you who have his back.

Sometimes it's good to be the underdog. It keeps you humble, and it keeps you working hard every single day.

And that's what it's going to take to win.

Chip in before the September 30th deadline to show Governor Quinn you're standing with him:

Thanks.

A whole bunch of them tonight. From Fox, new numbers on the Democratic side in both Iowa and New Hampshire as well as nationally, while we have new New Hampshire numbers from Franklin Pierce/Boston Herald/RKM on both Democrats and Republicans. Both NH releases find Sanders up by a wide margin over Clinton in NH:

NH: 56% Sanders, 34% Clinton, 3% O'Malley
(FULL RESULTS: http://www.foxnews.com/politics/interactive/2016/01/25/fox-news-poll-sanders-up-by-22-points-in-new-hampshire/)

IA: 48% Clinton, 42% Sanders 3% O'Malley
(FULL RESULTS: http://www.foxnews.com/politics/interactive/2016/01/25/fox-news-poll-sanders-narrows-gap-in-iowa/

US: 49% Clinton, 37% Sanders, 1% O'Malley
(FULL RESULTS: http://www.foxnews.com/politics/2016/01/25/fox-news-poll-clinton-drops-below-50-percent-as-her-lead-over-sanders-shrinks.html)

From Franklin Pierce/Boston Herald/RKM, a new look at the New Hampshire race:

Republicans – Trump 33%, Cruz 14%, Kasich 12%, Bush 9%, Rubio 8%, Christie 7%, Fiorina 5%, Carson 4%, Paul 3%, Huckabee 1%, Santorum 0% (Full results: http://www.bostonherald.com/sites/default/files/media/2016/01/25/FPU-BH-Jan20-24-Rep.pdf)

Dear John,

If you visited The Hill website this morning, you've already seen the news.

The National Partnership is taking the fight to all the abortion opponents who are telling lies and then turning those lies into laws.

They claim these laws will help women's health, but they are really attacks on women's health. They make it harder for women to access abortion care.

They must be stopped.

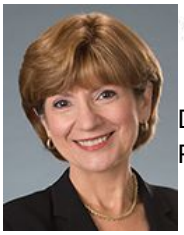
That's why we just launched a powerful online ad campaign that will include "homepage takeovers" of POLITICO, The Hill, The Washington Post (local distribution), and more.

Our digital ad doesn't mince words. We're telling it like it is and setting the record straight.

John, we're reaching out to you today with an important, time-sensitive opportunity.

If you chip in $3, $10, $20 — whatever you can afford — we'll keep these "Lies Into Laws" ads running on social media, petition sites and beyond.

Your contribution today will help us reach as many people as possible. Right now.



Help us spread the word about the urgent need to protect abortion access. Help us stop the lies and fight back for women's health.

Please consider making a special one-time contribution to our "Lies Into Laws" campaign today.

"This race will be one of the most watched in the nation."
- Rockford Register Star

John --

We told you the race for Illinois' 17th district wasn't going to be easy, and now it looks like things are heating up even earlier than we anticipated.

But if former Congressman Bobby Schilling thinks we're sitting back this August, he's sorely mistaken.

As of 2 PM, we're $7,900 short of our grassroots goal for August -- will you help get us there?

Help us shatter our August grassroots goal: Chip in $5 or whatever you can right now to help strengthen our grassroots movement and fight back against Bobby Schilling >>

These might be the lazy days of summer, but Mr. Schilling and his backers aren't sitting back -- they're raising huge amounts of cash from big right-wing donors.

That's why we need you to step up. If we can reach our grassroots goal, it will send a scorching message to Mr. Schilling.

Please, chip in right now to make this our strongest August yet:

News

U.S. News & World Report Ranks Georgetown Law Program No. 9 in Country

In the 2015 U.S. News and World Report ranking of Legal Writing programs , Georgetown came in at number 9.

Professor Jeffrey Shulman Wins Top Teaching Honor

The Frank F. Flegal Excellence in Teaching Award for the 2014-15 academic year went to Professor Jeffrey Shulman. This award closely follows Yale University Press's release of Shulman's book: The Constitutional Parent: Rights, Responsibilities, and the Enfranchisement of the Child.

Pro Bono Award Goes to Professor Frances DeLaurentis

The John Carroll Society has selected Professor Frances DeLaurentis as a recipient of its Pro Bono Legal Service Award. Professor DeLaurentis, along with her first-year class, created legal research handbooks used by the Catholic Charities Legal Network of the Archdiocese of Washington. The award will be presented in October.

Professor Kristen Tiscione is commenting on a rewrite by Professor Angela Onwuachi-Willig of the University of Iowa College of Law of the Supreme Court's decision in Meritor Savings Bank v. Vinson as part of a forthcoming book to be published by Cambridge University Press.

Welcome to Two New Legal Writing Faculty Members

The Legal Writing faculty warmly welcomes Jessica Wherry and Jarrod Reich . Jessica (who visited at Georgetown from 2012-14) was most recently Associate Director of the Legal Research and Writing Program at George Washington University School of Law. Jarrod was a legal writing professor at Florida State University College of Law and previous to that was a litigator at Boies, Schiller & Flexner LLP.

Teaching Innovations

Professor Diana R. Donahoe has upgraded her interactive, online legal research and writing book, TeachingLaw.com, in collaboration with Jill Smith, Matt Zimmerman, and Michelle Wu of the Georgetown Law Library, where it is now published and available at an affordable price for students nationwide.

Professor Vicki Girard is designing a practicum course on Medical Legal Partnership, a health care delivery model that recognizes that some barriers to good health have legal remedies.

Professors Rima Sirota, Kristen Tiscione, Vicki Girard, and Erin Carroll created a brief-writing project based on a real-life issue: a prison's decision to ban the book Prison Grievances by Terri LeClercq. The book instructs prisoners on how to successfully pursue grievances through an often-hostile prison system and the courts. At the end of the spring semester, LeClercq spoke to students about her fight to get the book into prison libraries.

Selected Publications

Professors Sonya Bonneau and Susan McMahon's textbook, Legal Writing in Context: Rhetoric, Reasoning, and Procedure, is forthcoming in 2016 from Carolina Press.

Professor Erin Carroll's article, Protecting the Watchdog: Using the Freedom of Information Act to Preference the Press, is forthcoming in the spring 2016 volume of the Utah Law Review.

Professor Frances DeLaurentis published When Ethical Worlds Collide: Teaching Novice Legal Writers to Balance the Duties of Zealous Advocacy and Candor to the Tribunal, 7 Drexel L. Rev. 1 (2014).

Professor Diana R. Donahoe published Fourth Amendment "Cheeks" and Balances: The Supreme Court's Inconsistent Conclusions and Deference to Law Enforcement Officials in Maryland v. King and Florence v. Board of Chosen Freeholders of the County of Burlington, 63 Cath. U.L. Rev. 549 (2014).

Professor Julie Ross published [Un]Happy Together: Why the Supremacy Clause

Tentatively, Terry is planning on Dec 9 in NY as the year end meeting which has BC tentative blessing but she's awaiting his final confirmation. Based on that I would suggest that we do a pre-call early next week which gives us a few days to turn the docs around and distribute 1 week in advance to all and since date is tentative and could change, we will be prepared either way. Please advise if this makes sense to all and then let ana know date preferences for the pre-call and if anyone else should be included (ie Terry M, Bob, Ira, others?). Thx lg

Hi Michael -
This is such fun.
All due to Cheryl Mills starting the ball for another purpose - now the geometry and enthusiasm of all has taken over.
Can you send me email addresses of all you have just proposed - and other too? Tomorrow I will come up with current list to date - and urge more names be included. I just thought of Charles Burson!! Copied here.

Adam,

Thanks for sending. I would love to join.

Lanny, don't know who is all on your list, but I've added Shelli Peterson and Karen Popp to the cc line. (I see Karl's and Dimitri's names in this chain, so assume you had them).

I also have contact info for the 3 paralegals, all of whom are practicing lawyers now (Debb Falk Zerwitz, Erin Greene-Comite, and Demi Doufekias.). Let me know if you want me to send you their info.

Subject: Consensus and early returns pre-Nov. 3 election in: December 13 evening //WH Counsel reunion circa Quinn-Mills era plus/minus

Dear Cheryl, Bruce, Jack, all:

We are set for WH Counsel o
Office reunion for Saturday night, December 13.
I will reserve an area at 8 pm at Rumors, 19th and M, for the food and libations into the evening. Before then,at 7 pm, we will for the Roast, MC'd by the infamous and formidable Roaster, Lanny Breuer, at the offices of Levick, next door, 1900 M Street, 4th floor.

I need 1) RSVPS from all on this list and 2) please send me names and email addresses of everyone you can think of - whenever they served. Our focus is on the 95-00 era but all alumni are welcome. (For example, Bernie Nusbaum and I have stayed in touch and I will certainly invite him. Friends who served in press and political offices at WH, such as McCurry, Sosnick, Rahm, et al. --whom we attorneys often tormented -- will be welcome, as well as friends then at DoJ, including our friend who is the current AG.

Look forward to hearing from you and getting your lists/ema addresses.

Contact point and coordinator for this event is Maddie Melendez, 202-973-5346 (copied above), who has managed to survive working with me (or me for her) since I left WH, or 15 years!

Regards,

Lanny

Ok - the response from all - and I mean all - has been enthusiastic for reunion of Clinton WH Counsel's office circa the Quinn-Mills era plus or minus whatever.

So I am going to going a head and propose a date:

Saturday December 13 early evening somewhere in DC - or Sun Dec 14 brunch hour - or both. Less likely since close to Christmas but another option would be Sat Dec 20 or Sun Dec 21 brunch or both.

All: please vote.

The idea: the WH Counsels roast the deputies, the deputies roast back, and the rest of us roast everyone -- and Lanny Breuer - with the odd title of "Special Counsel (not that Lannythinks he is "special"), and with the odd first name that is not a nickname - as the MC.

Please respond if either of these weekends work and which one in order of preference.

Maybe even our former client can be found back in the USA this time of year to make it too, or could send a recorded message reminding us how much he loves lawyers!

Special note to Bruce Lindsey: please come! We need you for special roast material!

May ask all on this list to:

1) tell me "yes" you can make it on the 13th/14th or 20th/21st. I will circulate the consensus choice. And
2) send me names and email addresses of all you can think of who should be invited.

I will then let all know whether the 13th/14th or 20th/21st works for the most people.

Here's hoping we can pull this off.

Best to all,

Lanny

LCV Victory Fund and Priorities USA Action Drop Early-Vote Mailer in Critical Primary States

Washington, D.C. – Following Hillary Clinton's big wins on Super Tuesday, today, the League of Conservation Voters (LCV) Victory Fund and Priorities USA Action announced a direct mail campaign in support of Hillary Clinton for president and targets Democratic primary voters in Florida and North Carolina, encouraging them to take advantage of early vote options in their states. The $274,000 campaign targets 565,000 households.

This is the first independent expenditure by LCV Victory Fund this cycle, and follows a previous digital campaign by LCV in support of Hillary in January.

Early voting can play a significant role in elections. For example this week in Texas, the largest Super Tuesday state, 1.1 million people voted early out of 4.2 million total votes cast.

The mailer calls on voters to "Join me in Building on the Progress We've Made Under President Obama," directly quoting Hillary. It details her stated positions on issues such as the ongoing water crisis in Flint as well as raising incomes, reducing gun violence, protecting the Affordable Care Act, and fighting racial injustice.

"Early-voting is a critical way to encourage voter participation, and open up the democratic process to communities too-often excluded," said LCVVF National Campaigns Director Clay Schroers. "We are also excited to continue sharing our message about Hillary, who has committed to building a campaign that will build upon and expand the progress made under President Obama. On a whole host of issues that Democratic voters care deeply about she has outlined a bold vision for our future. This includes her continued outspoken leadership on bringing attention to the ongoing water crisis in Flint, and highlighting the critical important of environmental justice for vulnerable communities across the country."

Eric Garcetti FOR MAYOR 2013

Dear Friend,

Garcetti for Mayor lawn signs have arrived. Eric Garcetti's supporters come from all over Los Angeles. It's time to tell our neighbors who is the best candidate to be the next mayor of Los Angeles. Show your support and sign up here to get an Eric Garcetti for Mayor lawn sign.

We need volunteers to help us deliver lawn signs so that we can get the word out about the best candidate for mayor of Los Angeles. Sign up here .

Did you miss the our debate last night? You can watch it tonight on KCET's SoCal Connected at 5:30 p.m. or stream it the internet after the broadcast here .

Make sure you do not miss Monday's debate. It will air live KNBC at 7pm. Limited tickets are still available for free at Ticketmaster. Get your tickets here to watch the debate in person.

Eric continues to fight for renewal of Senator Feinstein's federal assault weapons ban. Earlier this week, the City Council voted on Eric's resolution to have the City formally support both Feinstein's bill and President Obama's gun control plan. Eric said, "L.A. has some of the toughest gun laws in the nation, but assault weapons from other states aren't blocked by our city limits. To protect our local neighborhoods, we need a federal solution."

Eric was also endorsed by the Association of Independent Commercial Producers. Commercials are an important engine of job creation. As mayor, Eric will keep leading the fight to keep commercial production in Los Angeles to grow our economy.

I gotta say I think it's weird for her to say Bernie is attacking her. That will be what press focuses on. It also sets up everything she says after that comment as an attack on Bernie. So would not do.

Saw this formulation of Christie's in an article:

Speaking about a potential campaign today in Akron, Christie said, 'I've got a lot to work on before I worry about that decision and a day job that keeps me fairly busy,' according to KTIV.

Christie acknowledged today that he's 'considering' a run in 2016 while continuing to claim that he hasn't made a decision yet. 'When I do, I will certainly let everybody know,' he noted.

Subject:	UPDATE: $22mil outside spending in CO

Dear Friend,

Outside interest groups have spent $22 million this year to influence Colorado voters.

Colorado families can't keep up with that level of spending. These outside groups are dominating the debate in Colorado and drowning out the voices of the families government is supposed to serve in the first place.

Outside spending in 2014 could break records for a midterm election. Building up our grassroots defense is essential -- give $5 now.

If you've saved your payment information with ActBlue Express, your donation will go through immediately:

Express Donate: $5

Express Donate: $25

Or donate another amount.

The special interests behind this year's spending spree aren't concerned with growing jobs or making it easier to afford a college education. They're only interested in their own agenda, and they don't put anything ahead of their own bottom lines.

These outside groups are going to double down on this strategy two years from now. We have to be ready for that if it comes our way.

Your contributions give us the ability to fight back. Help us reach our $10,000 goal for November by chipping in five bucks.

Thank you.

LCV VICTORY FUND

Help Ed Markey win -- Donate to LCV Victory Fund! The June 25th special Senate election is just FOUR days away. Chip in and help make Ed Markey the next U.S. Senator from Massachusetts.

John, this weekend is the final election push for Ed Markey in the Massachusetts special Senate election. We are just FOUR days away from Election Day.

We need to raise another $35,000 by Monday to get Ed Markey the help he needs on the ground in Massachusetts. It's a door-to-door, neighbor-to-neighbor campaign right now and we need your help to win.

Recent polls show Ed Markey's opponent, Gabriel Gomez within striking distance. Gomez is trying to sell himself as a new kind of politician, but he has the same old extreme positions that make him out of step in Massachusetts.

Even more troubling, Gomez stands with Big Oil, opposes key actions to address climate change, and supports the dirty and dangerous Keystone XL tar sands pipeline.

Help Ed Markey win the Massachusetts special Senate election on Tuesday!

There are just four days left and thousands more Massachusetts voters to contact. Can you help?

Contribute today>>

Donate to LCV Victory Fund. Turnout is key and we need to make sure that every Ed Markey supporter turns out on Tuesday.

This race has been a top 2013 priority for LCV Victory Fund. We've made more than 430,000 voter contacts during the primary and just last week, we launched a mail program to target 150,000 households in the state.

But it's not enough. Out of state money is expected to pour into Massachusetts this weekend. Big Oil has a lot riding on this race and they refuse to let it slip away. We can beat Gabriel Gomez, but we need your help to do it.

Whether Ed Markey wins or loses next Tuesday all depends on turnout. In the Massachusetts special Senate election, a few thousand votes could mean the difference between winning and losing. I hope you will chip in right now to help LCV Victory Fund put Ed Markey over the top.

As we've said before, we need more climate champions in the U.S. Senate. We may never be able to match the amount of money that Big Oil spends to elect its cronies to Congress, but with the help of LCV Victory Fund supporters like you, we can ensure that a candidate like Ed Markey -- who champions our environmental values -- has the resources he needs to win next Tuesday.

Thank you for supporting Rep. Ed Markey and LCV Victory Fund.

Best--

Subject: CHAI fund and advisory board

You probably already are aware but just to be sure: yesterday in the CHAI board meeting, Ira discussed the formation of an advisory board for CHAI – he said he is targeting 10 people to each give $500k per year for 3 years. He mentioned the names below. He also said he is looking to do a series of dinners on the west coast, east coast, and overseas to raise money for a CHAI Innovation Fund that would "invest" in projects / businesses that CHAI deems worthy. He said the first dinner is on west coast with 30 people and hosted by Christian Anthony who he said he found via the Brown University alumni network. Given the enormous range of things that Ira is proposing the Fund be empowered to invest in, it occurred to me that IF the organization is comfortable with the creation of such a Fund bearing WJC's name (via CHAI), then why not have CF do it, so that CF can decide whether to invest in CHAI projects or also in other things like a farm in Africa, etc – and also to give WJC better control of it? The proposed CHAI Innovation Fund seems poised to go well beyond what we would consider to be the core traditional work of CHAI on HIV/AIDS, malaria, etc (at least based on the investment examples in the documents Ira provided) and I therefore just wondered why we'd cede this to CHAI to do/control. It's probably safe to assume that any Fund that bears WJC's name will attract "investors" or donors or whatever we call them. Maybe I am over-thinking this, but just wanted to brainstorm aloud and I'm happy to drop this if it's not worth discussing further. Thanks, Ami

NAMES IRA MENTIONED FOR CHAI ADVISORY BOARD (I probably am misspelling these):

- Craig Colgate at Pegasus Capital (Ira found via Brown U)
- Bob Selander (former CEO of Mastercard)
- Tood Fisher, Chief Admin Officer at KKR (also via Brown U)
- Bill Shuster at Evercore
- Bob Mancini, CEO of Cogentics (formerly at Goldman)
- Jeff Kushner from Blue Mountain Capital in the UK

Statement looks good - so long as the lawyers approve.

I would reach out to Obama supporters. Let me nominate Jamal Simmons. He's young (to me) Af-Am and way smart. He worked in the Clinton White House and now does commentary with me on CNN.

Other prominent African-Americans should be courted, like Donna Brazile.

How 'bout Dee Dee Myers? Not African-American, but rumored to be a woman. Knows the media as well as anyone.

Hispanics, anyone? Can we ask Maria Echaveste but not Chris Edley? (I'm kinda pissed at Chris for telling the NY Times that the Clinton Admin had a mixed record on civil rights. Funny, he didn't say that when he was in the Clinton Admin).

I will keep thinking.

DRAFT launch statement
PROGRESSIVE MEDIA

Progressive Media will serve as a communications and messaging nerve center for the progressive movement. We will create a robust echo chamber with messaging that spans from independent groups, to progressive partisans, to grassroots organizers, to the netroots. We will align messaging across broadcast and cable TV, radio, print, Internet, single-issue and advocacy organizations, progressive media, surrogates and new media. Through Progressive Media, during the 2008 election campaign we will focus on showing the public where John McCain stands on key issues facing America and the world. We seek to become a part of the permanent progressive infrastructure to last beyond the 2008 election. Breaking through the clutter of the modern media environment with a progressive message requires repetition of common themes from different sources organized by a central apparatus--that is the organizing task of Progressive Media.

Over the past week, we've been working really closely a great group of higher ed experts and smart policy-political folks including Gene and Neera. Together, we have decided that the Australia model doesn't go far enough because it keeps us doubling down on the student debt model, rather than getting at the heart of bending the cost curve and making college "as debt free as possible." In the next couple of days, we will be spending time meeting with experts and advocates to test out our "College Responsibility Compact" that would set up a compact between states-colleges-parents-colleges, each doing their part to work toward debt free tuition for students who attend public colleges and universities and would give bonuses to those colleges that go further and provide debt free cost of attendance for low-income students. meetings. My plan is that we can use the meeting to listen and test a few ideas without telling folks too much.

(2) Paid Leave - Just learned that Bernie's proposal is for 2 weeks of paid vacation - an employer mandate - that he envisions happening on top of "paid sick days and maternity leave." His presser is tomorrow at 11 am so we should learn more. But I'm pretty fascinated that both Bernie and O'Malley haven't fully embraced "paid family and medical leave" - and instead looking at paid sick days/paid vacation and parental leave. For us, we are still looking at the full paid family and medical leave, as well as the possibility of paid family leave (for new parents and caring for sick relatives) along with generous paid sick days proposal.

It is a pretty comprehensive speech that touches on many of the issues and points that we have been developing (with a harder hitting bent on the Dept of Ed's lack of enforcement of bad actors in the for-profit sector). Interestingly, however, while she says that every student should have a "debt free option" to attend college, her policy proposals to get there are first directed at the states: (1) states should invest more in higher ed; and (2) states should start refinancing student loans. She does say the federal government has a role to partner with states and fix the Pell grant program, but she doesn't really lay out a comprehensive plan of how we are going to get to a "debt free option" for every student.
> > > > I do, however, think that it will get quite a lot of attention and while we can still say our plan is coming later, the pressure will continue to mount. I'm attaching her full speech as an FYI. Also, as an FYI, I'm headed to DC to do meetings with higher ed groups on Thursday and Friday - and so this may generate some buzz.
> > > >
> > > > PAID LEAVE - Bernie's folks have been calling my friends in the paid leave world to let them know that he will be giving a major speech on paid leave and introducing legislation on paid leave on Thursday. No one has leaked it to me yet, but I assume it will be at least as comprehensive as Gillibrand's FAMILY Act. I'll let you know when I learn more.

Subject: [big campaign] Media Monitoring Report - Evening 09/19/08

Main Topics: McEconomics, McLobbyists

Summary of Shift: Alaska's First Dude says thanks, but no thanks to the subpoena against him. Meanwhile, FNC reports "Investigator extends subpoenas until September 26th." CNN reports "Polls show Palin appeal waning." McCain urges the fed to stop bailouts while Paulson and Bernanke warn of "disaster" without them. During a Barack Obama campaign stop a dozen protesters interrupt his stump with some unusual signs while Biden reminds Americans of McCain's anti-regulation history. The resentment Palin expressed as a result of being snubbed for the anti-Iran rally was a recurrent subject of discussion and coverage.
Following a federal rescue of billions in bad mortgage debts, stocks soar. Bush concedes that confidence has b een shaken significantly. Radical Saudi Cleric, Sheikh Saleh el-Lheidan issued a fatwa against Mickey Mouse (a ka 'Satan's agent') as well as some Middle East soap operas. Hackers also infiltrated the Ayatollah's site and put Bill Maher on its homepage. Mid-evening the SEC issued a statement vowing an expansion of their investigation into market manipulation and aggressive prosecution for those found guilty.

Highlights:
1) McLobbyists go to bat for their candidate
   a. FNC: Pfotenhauer claims her camp has most transparency in history of presidential elections and guards against future lobbying activities
   b. FNC: Holtz-Eakin touts McCain's economic prowess
   c. MSNBC: DHE answers questions about McCain's support for Bush's proposed solution to the economic meltdown
   d. CNN: Doug wants to bestow hope unto Main Street

Clips
Pfotenhauer Criticizes Obama's Transparency (FNC 09/19/08 1:35pm)
MARTHA MACCALLUM: Let's talk about the connections to Fannie Mae. Barack Obama's campaign is saying if you want to open that can of worms, we can start pointing to Charlie Black and Rick Davis and others who have had connections through lobbying efforts to Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac. They're saying don't go there because it doesn't make any sense to go there given what he we have on the other side of that argument.

NANCY PFOTENHAUER: Well, Martha the difference is that these two gentlemen actually ran Fanny Mae and so that's a very big difference between someone who might have done some consulting work for the entity and somebody who had direct control over the entire thing—

MACCALLUM: But, Nancy what are you saying—

PFOTENHAUER: —at a time when balance sheets were manipulated and they walked away with million dollar packages.

MACCALLUM: We all know what happened at Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, but, in terms of—they're saying that there was no relationship with Franklin Raines, and even the paper that first quoted those relationships has admitted that, you know, it was a very sort of off the cuff comment that Franklin Raines made once about, you know: yes, I did once get some calls from the campaign but they say he is not, never has been an official economic advisor to that campaign.

PFOTENHAUER: You know, Martha, it's difficult to check them on that, isn't it—because they refuse to list their advisors. They've never done that despite repeated requests. They don't comply with our standards, which are the highest that have ever been used in presidential election history as far as lobbying goes and future preclusion of lobbying activities and so there is no way to check them. What we do know is Mr. Raines stated it and The Washington Post reported it on more than one occasion.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

MACCALLUM: You know, they're saying that each one of those occasions that they reported it referred to the same moment in time but let's leave that where it is for now. Let's talk a little bit about the polls because John McCain is at the biggest deficit he has seen since the Republican National Convention; at least in the Gallup poll today: 49% for Barack Obama – 44% for John McCain. It doesn't seem that he is weathering this economic crisis very well in terms of the polls.

PFOTENHAUER: Well you know what? Martha, it's not over yet. What we saw this week was emblematic and the difference between John McCain and Barack Obama. John McCain showed leadership. He didn't didn't do the rhetorical equivalent of voting present, the way Barack Obama has done during this. Barack Obama won't even make a statement really on the A.I.G. deal; wouldn't say 'thumbs up' or 'thumbs down.' Senator McCain came out immediately with a very specific plan, in fact, ahead of the treasury department, ahead of the White House, ahead of congress, and what they're talking about right now seems to resemble, in many of its principles, what Senator McCain's plan was.

So he leads. He goes out in front of the problems to solve the problems the country is coming and Barack Obama just gives a speech about it.

Holtz-Eakin Questioned on the Legitimacy and Purpose of McCain's MFI Plan (FNC 09/19/08 1:18pm)
SHEPARD SMITH: John McCain said today that he wants to start something called the Mortgage and Financial Institutions Trust, the MFI, which would identify these institutions that are on the verge of failing and then fix them before they collapse. Is it just more corporate babysitting, Doug?

DOUGLAS HOLTZ-EAKIN: Well, it's an attempt to make sure we don't have happen what happened with Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac, which is a big collapse and the money ends up on the backs of the taxpayers. We don't want to have another Bear Stearns. It's time to get ahead of this problem. And the Senator wants to put in place this trust. The trust would identify troubled institutions. They would get bridge financing and that financing would give them the time to sell of distressed assets, find a core business that's profitable, go forward with that business and then the taxpayers going to claim on their future profits to repay them for the bridge financing. And that's a way to get this economy going, we can't afford to have these kinds of problems, people need jobs and this is a way to get us past that.

SMITH: Noted Doug, but you say it's time to get ahead in this and in the next breath John McCain comes out and says the SEC, the SPIC, all these other different organizations have really done a lousy job, yet he wants to add one more. Before we add one more, don't we have to wipe some of these things out?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: Well, this is not anything that would be permanent, this is a bridge to the future for the troubled firms we have now. The other part of the plan, a fact finding commission, a legislative strategy, some principles for safety and soundness, consumer protection, getting rid of golden parachutes for CEOs and having a stable system, that's where we have to end up, so that we're never in this position again. You know, John McCain called for things like this two years ago with Fannie Mae, Freddie Mac, no one listened. Here we are, big taxpayer bailouts, financial system in crisis. Let's not wait another two years, let's fix the problem, get America going again.

MARTHA MACALLUM: . . . you look at all this agencies and I just can't help but wonder, what the heck they've all been doing while all of this is happening and should John McCain, or Barack Obama, both Senators be calling for the elimination of some of these agencies?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: We should see comprehensive financial reform and that reform, as I said, should end up with less of an alphabet soup, some nice comprehensive, cohesive legislation—

MACALLUM: . . . what agencies would you advise go out of existence, any?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: Look, we've got a CFTC, an FTC, an FDIC, SPIC, public accounting oversight board—
[Holtz-Eakin is cut off for breaking news. He does not return.]

Holtz-Eakin Addresses Contradictions Between Bush and McCain Statements and Attacks Obama's Remarks on the Economy (MSNBC 09/19/08 1:45pm)
NORAH O'DONNELL: Let me ask you about McCain's speech this morning. He said, "no more bailouts by the Federal Reserve." And then we heard the president about an hour and a half later announce this bailout by the federal government. Does McCain support the efforts made this morning . . . ?

DOUGLAS HOLTZ-EAKIN: What Sen. McCain talked about this morning was an approach that gets ahead of the problems and establishes what he calls a Mortgage and Financial Institutions Trust. That trust would take on proactively large trouble financial institutions. It would as a result, relieve the Federal Reserve of the obligation of stepping in in a crisis, bailing out another firm. It would find an orderly way to get the troubled assets off their books. Get these loans out there, get credit markets functioning again and get the weight of Wall Street off the economy. It's an approach that, quite frankly, the congress and the administration could get behind. It would satisfy their goals. It would minimize the exposure of taxpayers and be a good thing for the American economy.

O'DONNELL: Ok, Doug, just so I understand, he does, McCain does support what the President laid out this morning? Yes or no.

HOLTZ-EAKIN: The details aren't yet out on exactly what they proposed, so it's hard to say. But, I think their broad principles match what the senator's trying to accomplish and I would encourage them to embrace his approach.

O'DONNELL: Let me ask you about Barack Obama and what he did today. He essentially held off on presenting a more detailed plan. And this is why he explained that he has done that. Take a listen.

BARACK OBAMA: Given the gravity of this situation and based on conversations I've had with both Secretary Paulson and Chairman Bernanke, I will refrain from presenting a more detailed blueprint about how an immediate plan might be structured until I can fully review the details of the plan proposed the Treasury and the Federal reserve. I think it's critical at this point that the markets and the public have confidence that their work will be unimpeded by partisan wrangling and that leaders in both parties work in concert to solve the problem at hand.

O'DONNELL: . . . he said it shouldn't be engaged in partisan wrangling, why then do you choose to put your plan forward?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: Sen. Obama has policies that are bad for jobs, he's got higher taxes on dividends and capital gains that'll hurt the stock market in this crisis. And he's got no plan to get through the financial crisis. Sen. McCain is looking at a landscape that's threatening to American families and he's gauged what is necessary and put forth good policies for Main Street, found a way to get the trouble off of Wall Street, get a transition to a new regulatory regime that protects American taxpayers and allows Wall Street to know the rules of the road. That's a game plan for the future. And Sen. Obama's watching it go by.

O'DONNELL: Can I ask you about a Wall Street Journal editorial today that essentially was a very scathing critique of McCain. It said, quote, "Mr. McCain is sounding like a candidate searching for a political foil rather than a genuine solution. He'll never beat Mr. Obama by running as an angry populist like Al Gore, circa 2000." Can you respond to that, that McCain has been flailing about for a message, that he was against a bailout and then he supported it; that this week he was for a 9/11 style commission and then you announced a different plan today. Are you guys still searching for the right way to deal with this crisis?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: This is one plan. The 9/11 comission is intended to do the fact finding necessary for a regulatory reform for the 21st century. The MFI trust will get us from here to there. We can't just let Wall Street melt while we study the problem. They go hand in hand and the trust is temporary and then goes away. Quite frankly, if the Wall Street Journal isn't upset by what's going right now on Wall Street and the damage it's doing to America, if they're not troubled by the fact that people were put in mortgages that they never could afford and no one had any intention of living to the end of their financial lives then they're missing problems in America.

O'DONNELL: . . . people say that it was you who joked or said seriously . . . that McCain's experience was that he created the BlackBerry, any comment on that today?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

HOLTZ-EAKIN: I have learned one thing and that is not to make jokes on the campaign trail and I am done discussing technologies and the history of their origins.

Holtz-Eakin Wants to Give Hope to Main Street (CNN 09/19/08 7:32pm)
DOUGLAS HOLTZ-EAKIN: The senator firmly believes that we should not be putting taxpayer money in casually. The only time it makes sense to put it in is to put money in to save the financial system, and thus people and businesses from greater harm […].

LISA SYLVESTER: Wait. Let me make sure I 'm clear on this. Does he support putting in taxpayer money for some type of a bailout? Does he echo some of the same sentiments Secretary Paulson outlined earlier today?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: The first choice is to not put taxpayer money in, but the reality is some institutions, AIG for example, are so large and present such a great threat to the American economy, that we would be negligent if we didn't get them through their problems, using minimal taxpayer bailouts, minimal taxpayer finances, and, in this case, find a way to not put them in bankruptcy. Find a way to get ahead of the curve, be pro-active. Give them a place to go where the workouts can happen and they can emerge as contributors to society and our economy, not a drag on it.

SYLVESTER: All right. I want to play a sound bite for you of Senator Obama today and what he had to say about the current situation.

BARACK OBAMA: Given the gravity of this situation, and based on conversations I've had with both Secretary Paulson, and Chairman Bernanke, I will refrain from presenting a more detailed blueprint about how an immediate plan might be structured until I can fully review the details of the plan proposed by the treasury and the Federal Reserve.

SYLVESTER: What is your reaction?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: Well, Senator McCain actually has a plan. He has a plan that minimizes the taxpayers' involvement, it gets ahead of the problem, it doesn't put the liabilities on the government books, it doesn't do what we did with Fannie Mae and Freddie Mac and take on $5.6 trillion of liabilities. Senator Obama is just going to, you know, vote present once more in a crisis. We need some ideas. You need to be able to stand up, [and] take some leadership. We hope the Bush administration, we hope the congress gets together, and realizes that Senator McCain has a plan and should adopt it and move forward.

SYLVESTER: Whoever is elected the next president will have to deal with this crisis squarely. What type of regulations will we see coming out of a McCain administration so that we are not in the same situation down the road?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: Well, you want comprehensive regulation that treats every economic transition—transaction exactly the same no matter where it takes place. If it takes place in Chicago, in New York, on an electronic trade, it should have the same regulatory structure. What should come out of that should be a regulator that has safety and soundness for every financial institution and the ability to shut it down if it's a danger to America and some consumer protections—no more mortgage fraud—and some corporate governance reforms so we don't see CEOs walking away from failed institutions with multimillion dollar golden parachutes and you like to make sure the system has some stability and there was a check on that stability. There's a path to that through the congress, the senator is dedicated, as president, to making it happen and we think this is a way forward in the 21st century to set the rules of the road right so we can have a good financial service industry but not see the excess and the real failures of the recent past.

SYLVESTER: Really quickly—there are a number of democrats that are proposing some type of help or relief for middle-class families that are struggling, the idea being that as congress gets set forth to bail out wall street that something should be done for the folks on main street. What are your thoughts there?

HOLTZ-EAKIN: I think it's imperative that we have hope for Main Street. That's why John McCain wants to make sure that main street doesn't get crushed by this Wall Street problem. That main street has a chance to create jobs, build a foundation of future prosperity and quite frankly the senator from Illinois, Senator Obama's plans to give someone a $500 tax credit, that's not going to be much help if you're out of work. You need a plan to have jobs. John McCain is creating jobs in health care plans, energy plans, tax plans. It's the future for the middle class.

John - I'm taking off my yay-Bernie hat for this and putting on my #NeverTrump hat:

IMO this is potentially a bad direction for messaging. This email is using similar linguistic tricks that Trump uses, designed to activate the fear response. The word "hate" is the most common word in the email.

"Trump uncensored Trump terrifying absolutely hate hate insults hate total lack impact hate KKK IT'S THE KKK hate president Hillary Trump"

In my opinion (which of course could be 100% wrong!), it's a trap - it gets clicks but in the long run hurts not just Clinton and the Democrats but anyone opposing Trumpian politics.

Friend --

I'm going to say this flat out:

I think Donald Trump is terrifying, and I absolutely hate what he stands for.

I hate how he insults women, people of color, and entire countries when it suits him. I hate his total lack of understanding of complex issues that impact Americans. I hate that he said he "didn't know enough" about the KKK to disavow an endorsement from its former leader -- WHAT DOES HE NEED TO KNOW? IT'S THE KKK!

But here's what I hate most: He could be our next president.

Don't let it happen. This nomination is in sight -- chip in $1 right now to help Hillary win, so she can take Trump down:

LCV Names Pat Toomey to 2010 Dirty Dozen, Launches Web Ad Targeting Big Oil Money & Drilling Support
VIEW WEB AD HERE: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=A93zPtaVY0Y *****

WASHINGTON – Today, the League of Conservation Voters (LCV), which works to turn environmental values into national priorities, named former Club for Growth President and Pennsylvania Senate candidate Pat Toomey to its 2010 "Dirty Dozen" list. Coinciding with the announcement, LCV is launching an online campaign that includes a web video and targeted online advertising, alerting Pennsylvania voters to Toomey's campaign cash from Big Oil and his dangerous support for oil and gas drilling in Lake Erie, even in the wake of the Gulf Coast catastrophe and the record-breaking Midwest oil spill in the Kalamazoo River. View the web ad here: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=A93zPtaVY0Y

"Be it as a member of Congress or president of the Club for Growth, Pat Toomey has made clear that he walks lockstep with Big Oil and other corporate polluters while opposing new energy policies that would set America on the path to a clean energy future," said Tony Massaro, Senior Vice President for Political Affairs at the League of Conservation Voters. "From drilling for oil in the Great Lakes to opposing legislation that creates clean energy jobs, his extreme views on energy policy put him far outside the mainstream and easily earn him a spot on the Dirty Dozen."

Toomey's Big Oil record:

- Toomey's lifetime LCV environmental score is an abysmal 11%. In 2003 and 2004, his last two years in office, he received a 0% score after voting against every major piece of clean energy and environmental legislation.[1]
- As a Congressman, Toomey voted against repealing subsidies to Big Oil, against increasing energy efficiency measures and against efforts to help American drivers go further on a gallon of gas.[2]
- Over the course of his political career, Toomey has received more than $294,000 from energy interests, including $123,800 from the Oil and Gas industry.[3]
- Despite record oil disasters on the Gulf Coast and the Kalamazoo River in Michigan, Toomey continues to support dangerous oil drilling off of America's coasts as well as in Lake Erie – and as a member of Congress he voted to open the Great Lakes to oil drilling.[4]
- Toomey has also made his staunch opposition to comprehensive energy and climate legislation that creates jobs, reduces pollution and increases our national security a key part of his campaign.[5]

LCV's trademark Dirty Dozen program targets candidates for Congress — regardless of party affiliation — who consistently vote against clean energy and conservation and are running in races in which LCV has a serious chance to affect the outcome. Since 1996, more than 60 percent of the Dirty Dozen have been defeated. Senator Blanche Lincoln (D-AR), Representatives Roy Blunt (R-MO) and Michelle Bachmann (R- MN) and former Congressman Steve Pearce (R-NM) are currently on the 2010 Dirty Dozen list. Former Congressman Richard Pombo (R-CA) was the first candidate to be defeated of the 2010 Dirty Dozen. Learn more at http://www.lcv.org/dirtydozen.

'Engage Cuba': A Push for Closer Ties
By Shane Rogers, CQ Staff

“The earth moved on Dec. 17. There is no question about that,” Luke Albee, a Capitol Hill veteran, says of the day that President Barack Obama announced his intention to normalize relations with Cuba.

Sparked by the historic announcement, Albee soon teamed up with Steven Law, another longtime Washington hand, and political consultant James Williams to start Engage Cuba, an advocacy group urging Congress to lift travel and trade restrictions with Cuba.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The group formally launches June 16, and it already has the backing of several business and advocacy groups that support opening ties to Cuba, such as the National Foreign Trade Council, Council of the Americas and #CubaNow. Its emergence also coincides with the start of a high-profile super PAC, the New Cuba PAC, with similar goals.

Working to reverse a five-decade-long policy that has become ingrained in the American psyche will lead to some unusual alliances, and these three fit the bill.

Williams, 31, is president of Engage Cuba and one of the directors of the super PAC. A 2006 George Washington University graduate, Williams most recently was director of public policy at the Trimpa Group, a liberal consulting firm that worked on Cuba policy. He also previously was a consultant to the Bonner Group, a fundraising firm.

Williams is 24 years younger than Albee and Law, who were top congressional aides from opposing parties but who struck up a long-lasting friendship that was put to use in creating Engage Cuba.

Albee recently left his position as chief of staff to Sen. Mark Warner, a Virginia Democrat. He was chief of staff to Sen. Patrick J. Leahy, a Vermont Democrat, from 1993 to 2004.

Law was a longtime aide to GOP Sen. Mitch McConnell of Kentucky, including working as chief of staff to the future Senate majority leader from 1991 to 1997. Law will remain president of the GOP super PAC American Crossroads.

“James is the main guy in this enterprise,” Albee says. “I think Steven and I are doing what we can, based on our many years of experience, to give him counsel and all jointly go together and talk to folks about what we’re doing.”

The three men were drawn to the issue for different reasons. Albee wrote his master’s thesis on the 1961 Bay of Pigs invasion and has long worked on Cuba policy, at one point going to watch the Baltimore Orioles play in Cuba and partaking of a dinner with Fidel Castro. Law’s interest was piqued only after Obama’s announcement in December. And Williams, having spent time in Havana, says he has personally seen the desire of the Cuban people to embrace the United States.

“I was just shocked,” he says. “Of all the countries I have traveled to, I have never been to any place that they were more excited and warmer to America.”

Williams, Albee and Law know they’re in for a long fight. Each called for maintaining a sustained effort over the next few years and building support from people and organizations on both sides of the aisle.

The strongest opposition to ending the embargo has come from the GOP, though some Republicans, such as Sen. Jeff Flake of Arizona, support the administration’s push. Many in the business community, which has close ties to the GOP, are eager to take advantage of new markets in Cuba.

“There is a bit of a sense of a Washington spring going on in the Capitol,” says Law, who was previously general counsel for the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. Cuba “is one of those kinds of issues that could be one example of bipartisan cooperation flying forward.”

Dear John,

We've got breaking news in Kirsten's Senate Race. The former chief economist for Bear Stearns and policy advisor for President Bush, David Malpass, has written his Senate campaign a $1 million dollar check!

New York's Senate seat is NOT FOR SALE.

Please make a donation TODAY to help Kirsten prepare to fight off this self-funded attack. The Supreme Court struck down the "Millionaires Amendment" last cycle, meaning self-funding candidates can give themselves unlimited sums and candidates like Kirsten still have to abide by the donation limits under campaign finance reform.

The maximum you can donate a cycle is $4,800 for individuals and $9,600 for couples. Please, help Kirsten make her end-of-quarter filing goal of $150,000 by March 31. Donate what you can today!

Click here to rush a donation to Kirsten's campaign and help us meet our fundraising deadline of $150,000 by March 31. Self-funders like David Malpass may have the Millionaire's advantage, but Kirsten has a grassroots team to help us make up the difference. We're counting on you!

Sincerely,

Ross Offinger
Finance Director

Next, roundtable discusses new poll #'s.

Chuck says we did Andrea interview in part b/c her polls are tanking. Highlighted new polls.

Moved to inevitability discussion. Brokaw reminds everyone how important organizing is to wining IA, so polls are less significant in caucus states. Says HRC made huge mistakes in Andrea interview, saying he was "stunned" HRC said she wasn't think about her email construct when she entered the State Department. Says that takes away from big argument that she has integrity.

Chucks says we're now moving into an electability problem. New poll shows Biden runs stronger against Trump and Jeb. Kearns Goodwin says hard for HRC to keep saying "in time the email situation will be clear" b/c she's lost time and integrity and says she has to address this issue more aggressively than she already has. DKG also says many are supporting Sanders b/c they want to be part of a "movement" - and they don't feel there is a movement w/ HRC – lack of energy amongst women and girls.

Joy Reid reminds panel Biden doing ok in polls b/c he hasn't been attacked yet by the media the way HRC/other candidates have. Says HRC needs more energy and more excitement among women. Maybe Biden getting in energizes HRC's supporters.

Chuck says as bad as her poll #s are, Republicans would love to have them.

Hewitt says an even bigger problem for HRC moving forward will be Syrian crisis; Chuck says he thinks her separation from POTUS on how she would have handled Assad regime was most overlooked news of Andrea interview.

Subject:	This International Women's Day, take action for abortion rights

NARAL Pro-Choice America

Dear John,

We often focus on issues of reproductive freedom that affect those of us here at home—the nationwide crisis in clinic closures, the wave of anti-choice policy sweeping our state legislatures, the appalling rhetoric of anti-choice presidential candidates.

But on International Women's Day, it's important to recognize the role our nation plays in preserving and protecting reproductive freedom abroad. A massive barrier in the way of that? The Helms amendment.

Tell President Obama to make clear that the Helms amendment doesn't restrict abortion funding in cases of rape or incest, or when a woman's life is in danger. Sign the petition.

Signed into law in 1973, Helms was the first policy to roll back progress on abortion rights after Roe v. Wade. It restricts the use of U.S. foreign aid dollars for abortion services overseas and has been interpreted as prohibiting abortion care, even in the cases of life, rape and incest—the bare minimum standard.[1]

That means that some of the world's poorest women are denied abortion care, which is especially appalling considering that in developing countries, women face unacceptably high levels of pregnancy related-mortality and that today, rape is an increasingly common weapon of war.

Of course, any ban on abortion coverage limits a woman's autonomy. But legally, the Helms amendment does allow for abortion care in the case of life, rape and incest—and President Obama has a rare opportunity to use his executive power to change the circumstances for millions of women around the globe by correcting the false interpretation of the Helms amendment.[2]

Sign the petition to tell President Obama to clarify that exceptions for rape, incest or when a woman's life is in danger are allowed under the Helms amendment. Let's mark International Women's Day with substantive progress.

With a partisan Congress, our work to pass proactive pro-choice legislation takes time—time that survivors of rape and incest, or women whose lives are in danger, do not have. With the stroke of a pen, President Obama could vastly shift the landscape of reproductive freedom overseas, and make a substantial difference in the lives of women in need.

Clarification of this policy would be a small but critical step forward for women around the world, and reflect the fact that 7 in 10 Americans support access to abortion services.

Thank you for standing up for women everywhere.

ADD YOUR NAME: Tell Steve Scalise to step down as GOP Majority Whip.

In 2002 GOP Majority Whip Steve Scalise spoke at a rally sponsored by former KKK leader, David Duke. It's time for Scalise to step down as GOP Majority Whip. Agree? Then add your name to our petition.

NAME: John Podesta
PETITION SIGNATURE: PENDING

John:

Bottom line: the third-ranking member in the House spoke at a rally sponsored by white supremacists! It's time for him to step down from his leadership position for the good of the country.

We want to get 50,000 signatures of Americans who agree by next Tuesday -- one week into the new Congress.

Can you add your name and let Scalise know it's time to do the right thing and step down?

We can't do it alone. We need everyone to join us and make sure that Scalise knows that it's time to step down.

John -- Mitt Romney is taking the stage soon and we wanted to give you a quick update.

As of right now, we're short and we need YOU to give $5 or more to reach our $4,700 goal, and show Mitt Romney, John McCain, and all the rest that we're committed to helping Ann win.

We only have 12 hours left. Can you give?

The fact that John McCain dug up someone ALMOST as out-of-touch as he is to prop up his campaign is kind of stunning. After all, the infamous 47% comment wasn't Romney's only "what the heck?!" moment in 2012.

Remember, during the presidential debate in 2012, when Mitt Romney said that as governor of Massachusetts, he was presented with "whole binders full of women"? As if it were amazing that enough women to fill a binder could be qualified for a job in his cabinet. And that was in answer to a question about gender pay inequality.

If John McCain wants to rely on "binders full of women" guy, good for him. Ann relies on us. And today, we're going to come through for her.

Be one of the last handful that will help us reach our $4,700 goal by midnight. Click here to chip in.

Slow and steady wins the race. Let's reach this goal.

Subject: List of Ideas

We just ended our Ignite! Conference in St. Louis, where 1,000 of our best member leaders gathered to recommit to fighting to build economic and political power for all workers!

I'm following up on our conversation on how Secretary Clinton can engage with SEIU members and non-union workers. As you know our members are putting their hearts and souls into the Fight for $15 and a union, commonsense immigration reform, delivering on the promise of ACA, Blacks Lives Matter, and voting rights for everyone.

I'm looking forward to working together to think about how we can create spaces for the Secretary to have a dialogue with our members and non-union workers, so she can hear their stories, and they can hear how she's thinking about the issues that matter to working people. Here are a few ideas:

1. April 15 -- Fight for $15 Day of Action: The movement that started with fast food workers in NYC has exploded to include Walmart workers, airport baggage handlers and passenger service attendants, home care providers, child care workers, adjunct college faculty, and other underpaid people who want to create jobs that pay people enough to actually live on. On April 15, workers will take action in a major mobilization in Chicago, Los Angeles, New York City and two hundred other cities across the globe. These workers are taking a huge risk by taking a stand and need public support in the media and at actions.

2. Workers' Roundtables: These would provide an opportunity to have a conversation with workers about the challenges they face and to test drive solutions together. For example, we could pull together a group of childcare providers and fast food workers to talk with the Secretary about the challenges of our nation's lack of affordable, accessible, and universal childcare for low-wage workers and providers.

3. "Walk a Day" with our members. Sec. Clinton spending a day with childcare, homecare or other workers would be incredibly compelling and lift up the courageous, important and difficult work that service sector workers do every day to take care of our children, elderly and the disabled.

4. Conversations with SEIU Leadership: The SEIU Executive Committee (approx. 30 local union leaders) will meet in May in Chicago, and our full International Executive Board (70 local union leaders) will meet in Detroit in June. We could also pull together any subsection of leaders based on geography, industry, or other criteria.

Here's a list of some of what's on our calendar already. We're surprisingly nimble and could add public or private events with relatively fast turnaround.

March 30 – April 3	National Week of Action for Commonsense Immigration Reform
April 15	Fight for $15 Day of Action
May 1	May Day Actions for Commonsense Immigration Reform
May TBD	SEIU Executive Committee Meeting, Chicago
May/June TBD	SCOTUS decision on King v. Burwell
June 8-12	SEIU International Executive Board Meeting, Detroit

I look forward to talking more. Will be in Eastern time zone the rest of the week.

The previous tenant left a vacuum cleaner, leading me to believe that he or she made some effort to keep it clean and nonetheless the walls are caked in black grime. This place is truly gross.

We don't know what else to do, John.

- Republicans are trying to ELIMINATE a key campaign finance coordination limit.
- The Supreme Court is poised to hear a case that could lift a critical ban on money in politics.
- And as of 4:47pm, we're in serious jeopardy of missing tonight's end-of-month goal.

We're not in full-blown panic. Not yet. But if we're going to keep fighting Big Money Billionaires, we need at least 6,796 more donations by MIDNIGHT.

John, you're one of our most engaged members (thank you!). If you've been waiting for the right time to take your support to the next level, now is it.

Rush an urgent donation to become a Founding Member before midnight :

$50 >>	$100 >>

These latest attempts to gut our campaign finance system aren't just an insult to our mission...

They're an insult to every single person who believes it's time to take back our Democracy from the Big Money contributions that are corrupting Washington.

John, help us show Republicans we aren't backing down. Chip in $5 or more by midnight:

Dear Sir,

Subject: Disentanglement from Afghanistan

I have been conducting a pertinacious correspondence with your Committee in latest four years trying exerting pressure on US Establishment that might have eventually got NATO Troops been pulled out of Afghanistan. According to TV Program dedicated to US Arsenal as many as 7000 UAV are being stored unused in Magazines instead of attacking targets in Afghanistan with the following emerging advantages:
1) Severing Terror Organizations' from their Financial Sources
2) Salvation of millions of potential Drug Addicts from awful agony and death.
3) Acceleration of Troops pulling out from Afghanistan due to Intensification of Aerial raids.

Attachments:	2015-10-30 Longshoremen 745pm.docx

Hi all -- here's a draft for tomorrow in Charleston. This is kind of a hybrid event -- it's got a labor angle, but there will be a bigger audience there, and SC would like her to talk more broadly about the campaign.

So this starts with a strong labor message at the start. Then it goes into the stump. There's a bit in there about Charleston and guns. Otherwise, a lot of this should look familiar to all of you. Perhaps more importantly, it tracks with what she's been saying recently so it'll look familiar to her.

I've got to get this to the book soon so please send me edits as soon as you can.

Many thanks.

Most of this was broad political messaging focus but two points on CT/ISIS issues - second was clear rebuke of Kerry's comments the other day:

- ISIS in Syria: ISIS is losing ground, civilians are starting to be able to return home in areas; emphasize that critics of policy are not offering any new or realistic ideas/alternate solutions other than committing the U.S. to a long-term military campaign of boots-on-the-ground

- Emphasize that administration's policy on Assad has not changed, that he needs to go; continue working with partners and others to see how we can make that happen, and we are now seeing progress

NPR: "In Likely Democratic Primary, Who's Joining Hillary Clinton?"

By Tamara Keith

There may not be any officially declared candidates for president yet, but prominent Republicans from Jeb Bush to Rand Paul and Marco Rubio are making big speeches and jostling for consultants and donors. On the Democratic side, Hillary Clinton may not formally announce whether she is running for months. But any number of polls would indicate, without even declaring, she has a lock on the Democratic nomination.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Which got me thinking — who are the other potential Democratic candidates?

This may not be an obvious place to start, but I figured why not ask the opposition? America Rising PAC is a Republican group that exists to dig up dirt on Democrats. And it's on the lookout for presidential candidates to target.

"It really is tough," says Tim Miller, the PAC's executive director. He says each quarter the staff have a meeting where they sit down and basically ask themselves, "Who other than Hillary Clinton should we be researching?"

"And that list of strong candidates after Hillary is so small as to be potentially nobody."

To test the theory, I went to downtown Chicago — hotbed of Democratic politics — to ask people whom they expect to run for president. Here are some of the responses I got:

April Williams, sighing: "The only one I can think of is Hillary Clinton. That's about it."

Martha O'Connor: "Honestly, to be honest with you, Hillary is kind of the only person that pops into my mind."

David Johnston: "Joe Biden, you know, vice president. They usually go for it afterwards."

Adrienne Wonzer: "Hillary Clinton, first of all, and then Liz. Oh, my gosh. I can't think of her name. ... Liz Warren, No. 2. And I can't think of a third possibility."

Elizabeth Warren is a name that came up again and again. Hector Ortiz, who considers himself an independent voter, said he'd like to see her run. But, he said, "I don't know if she will."

As for Warren herself, she told us back in December, "I am not running for president. Do you want me to put an exclamation point at the end?"

So, who does that leave? Biden, who says the field is wide open but has made no obvious moves toward running. And there are three names that didn't come up once among the many people I stopped on the street in Chicago: former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, former Virginia Sen. Jim Webb and current independent Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders.

All this is making for a lonely time for New Hampshire Democrats who are accustomed to being heavily wooed at this point in the election cycle.

"You're seeing that fairly significantly on the Republican side, but on the Democratic side, not so much," says Kathy Sullivan, a prominent Democratic activist in the state.

On the Republican side, there are so many household names considering a run it's hard to keep track of them all. On the Democratic side, there's just Clinton.

One-time presidential candidate Bill Richardson has a theory about why. "The reason there's no bench is because she's the cleanup hitter that is so dominant nobody wants to challenge her. That's why there's no bench," he says.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Richardson is the former Democratic governor of New Mexico who ran in 2008 and ultimately endorsed President Obama — meaning he's not what you'd call a Clinton ally these days. The Democratic Party is in the midst of eight years of holding the White House, and pretty much the whole time, Clinton has been seen as the next in line. But Richardson isn't so sure her dominance is good for her.

"The public may perceive that it's a coronation, that she's not hungry enough. And sometimes combat, primary combat makes you tougher, makes you stronger, makes you a better general election candidate," he says.

Whether this ends up being a problem for Clinton, assuming she decides to run, depends on how the Republican primary plays out.

Will the nominee be sharpened by the experience with a finely tuned stump speech, or bruised, staking out positions unpopular with a broader public? For Democrats, the current situation represents a high-risk, high-reward proposition, but it may well be the only option they have.

People: "Angelina Jolie Launches Center for Women, Peace and Security in London"

By Kathy Ehrich Dowd

February 10, 2015, 11:20 a.m. EST

Angelina Jolie expanded on her humanitarian efforts Tuesday in London, announcing the creation of the Centre on Women, Peace and Security at the London School of Economics.

Jolie, 39, a special envoy of the United Nations High Commission for Refugees, attended the event alongside William Hague, Britain's First Secretary of State and leader of the House of Commons, PEOPLE confirms.

The new center will aim to educate students about the participation of women in "conflict-related processes" and "on enhancing accountability and ending impunity for rape and sexual violence in war," according to a press release from the renowned London School of Economics.

"I am excited at the thought of all the students in years to come who will study in this new Centre," Jolie said in a statement. "There is no stable future for a world in which crimes committed against women go unpunished. We need the next generation of educated youth with inquisitive minds and fresh energy, who are willing not only to sit in the classroom but to go out into the field and the courtrooms and to make a decisive difference."

The new center will support the goals of the Preventing Sexual Violence Initiative (PSVI), which Jolie and Hague co-founded in 2012. Next year, the newly announced center will begin offering post-graduate degrees. The center is also supported by former U.S. Secretaries of State Hillary Clinton and John Kerry.

Tuesday's announcement comes just two weeks after Jolie published an op-ed in The New York Times regarding her recent visits to camps for Syrian and Iraqi refugees.

"I have visited Iraq five times since 2007, and I have seen nothing like the suffering I'm witnessing now," wrote the mother of six. "Nothing prepares you for the reality of so much individual human misery: for the stories of suffering and death, and the gaze of hungry, traumatized children."

Salon: "The selling of Elizabeth Warren: What's behind progressives' debilitating fantasy"

By Joan Walsh

February 9, 2015, 2:08 p.m. EST

[Subtitle:] As my inbox fills with emails from groups "drafting" Warren, I find myself wondering who's helping whom here

I'm a huge admirer of Sen. Elizabeth Warren. She's the best new leader to emerge in the Democratic Party in decades. If she wants to run for president, I hope she does so.

But I don't think she wants to run for president. She's told us that in many different ways and places. I was particularly struck by her no-nonsense answer when asked by colleague Sheila Bair, but she's basically given no-nonsense negative answers since the effort to "draft" her began.

So I'm coming to find the "draft Warren" juggernaut a little bit perplexing. I know the participants have wonderful motives and genuinely would welcome a Warren candidacy. But with every email I receive, I get a tiny bit more cynical. It doesn't feel so much like groups are using their organizational strength to help Warren, but enlisting Warren to help build their organizational strength.

Don't get me wrong, I think MoveOn and Democracy for America have done important infrastructure and leadership building on the left of the Democratic Party. But I'm not really sure that the "Draft Warren "effort does much more for progressives than encourage a cult of personality – and risk member disillusionment when Warren all but certainly declines to make the race.

I confess my misgivings about all this crystallized Sunday night, when I heard the news that the Working Families Party had joined the "Draft Warren" movement. I admire WFP; I think they're doing exactly what progressives should be doing: Working within the Democratic Party and pulling it to the left, not standing outside the party and declaring it no better than the GOP.

But it was hard not to contrast their "Draft Warren" move, which looks symbolic at best, and contains an implicit challenge to Hillary Clinton, with their cave-in to Gov. Andrew Cuomo last year — which was not merely symbolic but had real ramifications. At that time, they had a terrific progressive female candidate, Zephyr Teachout, ready to challenge Cuomo – and they backed Cuomo. So to recap: With a willing progressive woman challenging a politically centrist Democratic man – the progressive didn't get the WFP endorsement. But now, with a centrist but more liberal (than Cuomo) Democratic woman, Hillary Clinton, (probably) running for president, WFP is courting a challenger — who (probably) isn't running anyway.

Predictably, other "Draft Warren" groups hailed the WFP news. Move On emailed to invite me to share a graphic on Twitter and Facebook that thanks WFP for joining the movement. "It's important that we show them this morning that the number of people who think they absolutely made the right decision far outweighs the nay-sayers" – that would be me, I guess.

In addition to advancing the assumption that the Clinton campaign won't be progressive enough, before she's even declared her candidacy, the hype about Warren serves to obscure the depth and breadth of the new populist movement afoot among Democrats in Congress. Why not draft Sen. Bernie Sanders, who says he'll run if he believes he has organizational backing? Or other progressive senators like Sherrod Brown or Al Franken or Kirsten Gillibrand? Elizabeth Warren is a star in her own right; she doesn't particularly need this kind of help.

It's also past time to observe that in addition to saying she isn't running, Warren hasn't done anything to build an organization in any of the early primary or caucus states. Now, presumably “Draft Warren” could help with that in the unlikely event she changes her mind – but Warren’s failure to make any of the moves associated with building a campaign is just one more reason to believe she won’t run.

I’d love to see a campaign that popularizes Warren’s “eight point plan to build the middle class” and encourages all Democratic candidates – including Clinton — to back it. Building a movement around a single political leader rather than around issues seems like a recipe for disappointment, especially when that leader has made it so clear she’s not looking to run for president.

Bloomberg: “How Long Can the Left Put Up With A ‘Draft Warren’ Movement?”

By David Weigel

February 10, 2015, 10:51 a.m. EST

In December, I stopped by the MoveOn/Democracy for America/Ready for Warren draft campaign launch in Des Moines, and saw around 100 progressives brainstorm ways to get Massachusetts Senator Elizabeth Warren to run for president. On Super Bowl Sunday, I sat in on a next-stage meeting, one of 209 happening around the country, in Washington. Twenty progressives showed up. This past weekend, The Washington Post's Robert Costa walked into a house party for Warrenphilia in Ames, Iowa, one of the state's largest college towns -- a place where 250 progressives had gathered to watch Vermont Senator Bernie Sanders give a December speech. Covering that speech, I'd noticed MoveOn one-sheets on a table, advertising the Draft Warren cause.

Thirteen people showed up to the house party that Costa covered. The headline, "Democrats suffering from Clinton fatigue say they’re ready for Warren," could be written from any room. It sounds a lot like what I've covered -- skewing old, lots of praise for Warren, bitterness about Clinton tamped down by people who worry that the energy will curdle if it's negative. Not much has changed since six months ago, when Ready for Warren emerged at Netroots Nation in Detroit, and reporters wrote basically the same stories. The October Bloomberg Politics/Des Moines Register poll of Iowa, for example, found Clinton up 43 points on Warren in a hypothetical 2016 caucus. January's edition of the poll found a flurry of Warren activity closing the gap to... 40 points.

The willingness of reporters to cover a fresh angle on the Clinton restoration -- an escape from the I, Claudius infighting of Clintonworld itself -- does not indicate that Draft Warren is working. In Salon, Joan Walsh has opened herself up to friendly progressive fire by asking what the Warrenphiles are even doing. Making news, obviously. The Working Families Party had told the New York Times that it was joining the Draft Warren effort. That made national news; a search for coverage of the Draft campaign finds it to be the most-covered WFP story since last summer.

What happened last summer? The WFP narrowly denied a nomination to 2014 Andrew Cuomo challenger Zephyr Teachout. It stiffed a candidate who was running; it was all-in for a candidate who wasn't.

"I’d love to see a campaign that popularizes Warren’s “eight point plan to build the middle class” and encourages all Democratic candidates – including Clinton — to back it," wrote Walsh. "Building a movement around a single political leader rather than around issues seems like a recipe for disappointment, especially when that leader has made it so clear she’s not looking to run for president."

Less clear: Whether Warren can be the challenger the whole left wants. On foreign policy, she has hewed closely to the Democratic Party mainstream. In a column from last year, after constituents finally got Warren to talk about the Gaza-Israel conflict, Glenn Greenwald surmised that she "sounds like [Israeli Prime Minister Benjamin] Netanyahu." Warren, whose first foreign trip as a senator took her to Israel last year, has stayed far away of the debate on Netanyahu's speech to Congress. The surreal result is that the only national politician trekking through Iowa taking on Hillary Clinton's foreign policy from "the left" is Kentucky Senator Rand Paul.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"I think the issue with Warren, to me, is somewhat different," said Jonathan Tasini, an activist and writer who challenged Clinton from the left in her 2006 re-election to the U.S. Senate. "It's distracting from building campaigns on issues and a better progressive movement. It actually has a bit of the 2007 love with Obama—people willing to not ask questions about what someone believes in and, then, surprise, they get a president who they are 'disappointed' with. I'm not sure what Warren's world view is on foreign policy—on Israel/Middle East, for example—that is that different than a pretty conventional wisdom position."

The Bernie Sanders network, which spends a lot of time answering questions about Warren, is sanguine about the draft movement. "If they're going to hold a lot of people in place for a while in free parking," said Sanders adviser Tad Devine to MSNBC, "and then Bernie can go collect the rent later, that's fine with me."

There's plenty of precedent for that. In 1968, when Senator Robert F. Kennedy dithered about challenging President Lyndon Johnson, Eugene McCarthy rushed into the gap. In 2004, when progressives lacked an obvious champion, Vermont Governor Howard Dean transformed from a Cato Institute-approved fiscal hawk to an anti-war icon. Dean's campaign spawned countless progressive organizations, activists, and writers, from Zephyr Teachout to Democracy in America.

But Dean did not have to put up with the dashed expectations that, say, Bernie Sanders would. If Warren has not been constantly lying to supporters and reporters -- a safe bet --the Draft campaign will end without a candidate. Sanders et al will enter the race as also-rans. The Draft Warren campaign is not wrong at all about presidential politics; there is no replacement for the energy of an insurgent bid. All it lacks right now is a candidate, and an insurgency.

Wall Street Journal blog: Washington Wire: "Boris Johnson Plans Meeting With Hillary Clinton"

By Nicholas Winning

February 10, 2015, 12:07 p.m. EST

Could this be what the "special relationship" between Britain and the U.S. looks like a few years from now?

London's mayor, Boris Johnson, a possible future contender for British prime minister, is due to hold one of his most high-profile overseas meetings on Wednesday when he sits down with potential U.S. presidential candidate Hillary Clinton during a six-day trade mission to the U.S.

Mr. Johnson, who was born in the U.S. and is a joint American/British citizen, has made a string of overseas trips to China and India in recent years. Officially, he is drumming up business for London, but observers suspect he is also on a mission to build his international profile and connections in preparation for a bigger job down the line.

Mr. Johnson recently announced he is standing as a parliamentary candidate in the U.K.'s general election in May, which has fueled speculation about his prime ministerial ambitions. Prime Minister David Cameron's Conservatives currently are neck and neck with the main opposition Labour Party in opinion polls. If the Conservatives put in a poor showing, that could trigger a party leadership contest.

Mr. Johnson was previously a member of Parliament but stepped down in 2008 to run for mayor. Known for his mop of blond hair and propensity for jokes that push the envelope, he is one of the Conservative Party's top electoral performers: He won more than one million votes in securing his second term as mayor in 2012. His profile grew with the successful Olympic Games in London that year.

In Boston on Monday, Mr. Johnson delivered a speech on technology. During Tuesday's visit to New York he is due to meet his counterpart Mayor

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Bill de Blasio, then on Wednesday he meets Mrs. Clinton and the city's Police Commissioner Bill Bratton. Mr. Johnson is then on to Washington, D.C., before ending his trip back in New York with a visit to the 9/11 memorial among other things.

During his visit the London mayor is looking to focus on collaboration between London and the U.S. on life sciences, business, technology, policing and culture, according to his office. London exports to the U.S. stand at about £4 billion (about $6.1 billion) a year, and there are now over 9,000 U.S.-owned companies in the British capital, according to the mayor's office.

While in the U.S., we can expect Mr. Johnson, whose full name is Alexander Boris de Pfeffel Johnson, to show his knack for publicity. In January, on a visit to the Kurdish prime minister, he posed for photographs taking aim with an AK47 and gave an interview in which he said men who joined extremist groups like Islamic State were losers who were unsuccessful with women.

Real Clear Politics: "RNC Video: Obama Pushing Hillary for 'Third Term'"

By Caitlin Huey-Burns

February 10, 2015

[VIDEO]

Republicans are wasting no time waiting for Hillary Clinton.

While several potential candidates jockey for spots in the GOP presidential primary field, the Republican National Committee is taking the fight straight to its presumed general election opponent, who has been notably absent from public view this year.

The RNC released a Web video Tuesday casting Clinton as the heir to President Obama's third term. The spot, first shared with RealClearPolitics, pieces together heavily edited video clips taken from White House and campaign video, news interviews, and a White House correspondents' dinner spoof, to make it look like the White House is calling upon Clinton to run and take up Obama's mantle.

The video opens with the president calling Clinton on his phone, which features "Hillary Home," "Hillary Jet," and "Hillary Jet 2" on speed-dial. "I want to know if you're on board … because I'm counting on you," he says in one clip, set to cheesy slow-jam music. "Of course, I will do anything to help," Clinton says in a spliced-in separate clip.

The spot then cuts to Obama calling upon Vice President Biden, whose response implies he is declining to run for the Oval Office. "No, I'm not going, I've been there once," Biden says. "OK, good," the president responds.

The footage concludes with the text, "Hillary already signed up for Obama's third term."

This week, the RNC launched a "Hillary's Hiding" campaign to highlight the presumed candidate's absence from the national stage this year after a series of high-paid speeches around the country and elsewhere. A committee memo highlights the days passed since Clinton visited Iowa (103) and New Hampshire (100), urging her to "face the American people" she wants to lead.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

With a crowded Republican field and little substantial opposition to her on the Democratic side, Clinton can afford to lie low and concentrate on building her campaign while the GOP opponents duke it out amongst themselves. Some reports say Clinton won't officially announce her campaign until July.

For now, the former secretary of state has taken to weighing in on issues of the day through the condensed form of Twitter. During the recent vaccine debate that put some GOP contenders on the hot seat, Clinton waited out the storm until tweeting that the "science is clear." She used the hashtag, "#GrandmotherKnowsBest."

Heed Francis' message: be good stewards of the earth

By: Hillary Clinton, National Catholic Reporter

Friday, September, 25, 2015

http://ncronline.org/blogs/ncr-today/heed-francis-message-be-good-stewards-earth

This summer, for the first time since the Apollo 17 mission, NASA published pictures of the Earth captured in a single frame. They show our "blue marble" shining brightly in the darkness and vastness of space — a view of our world beamed by a satellite one million miles away. The pictures remind us all that our life here is mysterious, fragile, and worth fighting for.

His Holiness Pope Francis calls Earth "our common home." "Our common home requires our striving for the common good," Social Service Sr. Simone Campbell, one of the Nuns on the Bus, wrote earlier this year.

Other faith traditions believe this, too — including mine. As a Methodist, I was taught that we have a sacred duty to care for God's earth. "All creation is the Lord's," say the Methodist social principles, "and we are responsible for the way we use and abuse it."

As a person of faith, a mother, and a grandmother, I am deeply moved by Pope Francis' recent teachings on climate change — to reflect and above all to act.

The effects of climate change are too obvious to ignore. We can see them with our own eyes, in our own communities. In California, higher temperatures have worsened a brutal drought, which has lasted four years and shows no signs of abating. In New York, flooding from Hurricane Sandy was made worse by the fact that New York Harbor is nearly a foot higher now than it was 100 years ago. In Alaska, villages that were settled before the United States even existed are facing imminent destruction because of a rising ocean, retreating ice and more violent storms.

Pope Francis is right. All countries and all people are responsible for preventing the worst impacts of climate change. But countries like the United States have a particular role. We are rich, powerful, and blessed with many advantages. We must lead the charge.

Climate change will have serious economic and public health consequences for the United States — but that's nothing compared to what some other countries face. At the Copenhagen climate conference in 2009, I listened as the leaders of small island nations like the Maldives pleaded for the world to act. Otherwise, they said, our homelands will cease to exist. Rising seas will engulf us.

I've met with leaders from Africa's Sahel region. Droughts there have created millions of climate refugees.

For the first time in history, we are within reach of eradicating hunger and extreme poverty. But climate change threatens that progress.

Thanks to President Obama's leadership, the United States is rallying the world to act. Now Pope Francis is bringing his extraordinary moral leadership to the fight.

I'm grateful — as so many Americans are — for the pope's teachings. And as president, I hope to follow his example. I will make combating climate change a top priority of my administration.

We've made progress in promoting clean energy. Now we must do more to help developing countries embrace lower-carbon fuel sources, and continue to pick up our pace at home.

We've made progress in managing our lands and waters. Now we must do more to protect our global forest, which is still being slashed and burned, and our global ocean, which is growing more acidic, threatening the lives and livelihoods of billions of people.

We've made progress in cleaning our air over the last 40 years. Now we must do more to protect our poorest and most vulnerable citizens — including the elderly, children and communities of color — from the worst health effects of climate change.

But in spite of the strongest possible scientific consensus about what climate change means for our environment, economy, health, and future, there are still some who deny the facts. They're intent on obstructing progress.

We can't let them win this fight. We have no choice. There is no Planet B.

We need to develop an ethic of stewardship, of responsibility and sustainability — in our businesses, in our governments, and as citizens of the earth. The scale of the challenge we face demands nothing less.

The great American conservationist John Muir wrote, "Everybody needs beauty as well as bread, places to play in and pray in, where nature may heal and give strength to body and soul." Climate change threatens every place on our planet, from majestic landscapes to ordinary city streets. It threatens every facet of our economy—our agriculture, energy, transportation and tourism. And most importantly, it threatens the health, happiness, and future of every one of our children.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

I want my granddaughter Charlotte to know that her grandmother did everything possible to protect and preserve God's gift to us, this beautiful planet, our common home. That's why I'm in this fight. And I want all children everywhere, in countries large and small, to know the same thing about their leaders.

This week, as Pope Francis visits the White House, Congress and the United Nations, I urge Americans of every faith and political persuasion to listen to what he has to say. Heed his message of God's love for all creatures. Follow his urging to become good stewards of the earth. And do your part to fulfill our shared responsibility to our planet, our children, and our future.

Hoping this note finds you well.
As you may know from Herb and Susan Sandler, they have asked me to consider launching an education think tank. I'd love to get your thoughts and insights on one of my trips to DC. I'll be there this week, with some time on Thursday afternoon, and then I'll be back again in October, around the 15th – 16th. Any chance we could connect on either of these trips?

Jake,
I just had dinner this week with Zalman Shoval, who was twice Israeli Ambassador to the U.S. (1990-93 and 1998-2000), and is a keen observer of the Palestinian issue. He does not think a third intifada is likely, but that there will be persistent, uncoordinated, random acts of violence. Of course, an incident could lead to greater violence, particularly since the Prime Minister has given great latitude for the use of force in suppressing violence. But, basically, the Palestinian leadership's strategy is unilateral actions to isolate Israel and elevate the Palestinian cause, in the UN, ICJ, and with various BDS strategies, including the EU on West Bank labeling, rather than a third intifada. Moreover, given the enormous disruption in the region, the Palestinian people do not seem to have an appetitive for a major disruption.

That having been said, I am starting work on an op-ed on a "Plan B" for "peaceful coexistence", under the assumption that the peace process is stalled for the medium term and that greater economic development and opportunity for the Palestinians is good for them, good for Israel's security, and will reduce the risk of a third intifada. In the Clinton Administration, I was responsible for the economic dimensions of the peace process, which led to a QIZ in Gaza, the Gaza airport, a huge increase in Palestinian workers in Israel, some 20,000 Palestinian business leaders with passes to come into Israel, etc. New steps could include more vetted Palestinian workers coming into Israel (at the height it was around 100,000, of which 50,000 were legal and the balance tolerated); fewer checkpoints in the West Bank (I have a friend, David Harman, the son of Abe Harman, one of the first Israeli Ambassadors to the U.S. and then long-time president of Hebrew University), who teaches at Bard College, Hebrew University and al-Quds University in the West Bank. He tells me it takes some of his students 2 to 3 hours to get to classes: QIZs in the West Bank (there are none now, although there are about a dozen in Jordan and several in Egypt), which allow duty free treatment for goods produced in the QIZ, with as little as 10% Israeli content); more Palestinian construction permitted in Zone B and C, and transfer of some land from B and C to Zone A; greater Western/US assistance and development (it is unclear what happened to Secretary Kerry's pledge of $ billion).

Best wishes,

Stu

I know there has been a lot of uncertainty since the announcement that we are not running ads. I want to make sure I put an end to any speculation of what might happen next. As someone deeply vested in what we have built together this has not been easy.

First, I wanted to thank you for your head-down singular focus on knocking around the McCain team for their lobbyist ties. Working with our partners and relentlessly pursuing this you have broken through, despite the news about us not running ads.

The last week has shown exactly how an aggressive earned media campaign can screw with the McCain campaign. They are thin-skinned about these stories and there is a lot more there. We need to keep that going.

What is clear is that there are going to be changes in how we do our work-a restructuring.

I wanted to share the possible options with you and a timeline of what you can expect.

1. WHOLE CAMPAIGN TAKEOVER -We might be subsumed into the work of a new organization. We would continue to co-locate and work together.

2. COMPONENT CAMPAIGN PARTS RESTRUCTURED -We may divide up the campaign projects and have partners take over various parts of the work, various staff pods and projects subsumed by partners. We would try to continue to co-locate and work together.

Timeline and Guarantees:

-The decisions about the next phase of the campaign will be made this week.

-You still have your job. We are working to make sure the transition to a new organization or organizations is seamless and trying to figure out transition assistance (pay) when it might not be.

I said it last week and I will say it again. No group of people on the planet is better prepared to take on John McCain right now. Back to work.

LEAGUE OF CONSERVATION VOTERS

Dear John,

"It's definitely one big cable buy." That's how Republican strategist Terry Sullivan characterized Sarah Palin's new reality show on TLC.

"Sarah Palin's Alaska" is like a weekly, one-hour TV ad that she's using to improve her image and boost her political aspirations.

The irony is she's trying to come off as a nature-loving protector of the great outdoors when in truth she supports climate change deniers and advocates for off-shore drilling.

We need to turn up the pressure and go straight to the paid advertisers of this "reality" show. We need you, our loyal grassroots members, to stand up and demand that these corporate sponsors stop funding Sarah Palin's 2012 presidential campaign.

Tell Corporate Sponsors of "Sarah Palin's Alaska" to stop their advertising IMMEDIATELY!

"Sarah Palin's Alaska" is nothing more than a weekly, one-hour TV ad that she's using to improve her image and boost her political aspirations.

Sarah Palin and her PR team think they can manipulate the media to their advantage, creating puff pieces and phony situations to try and convince the American people that this ex-governor is a friend of nature and cares about our environment.

We don't have to sit around and watch this happen. We can take a stand. So please, join me in fighting back and telling these companies that we know what Palin and her supporters are trying to do, and they shouldn't be funding it.

Sincerely,

Gene Karpinski

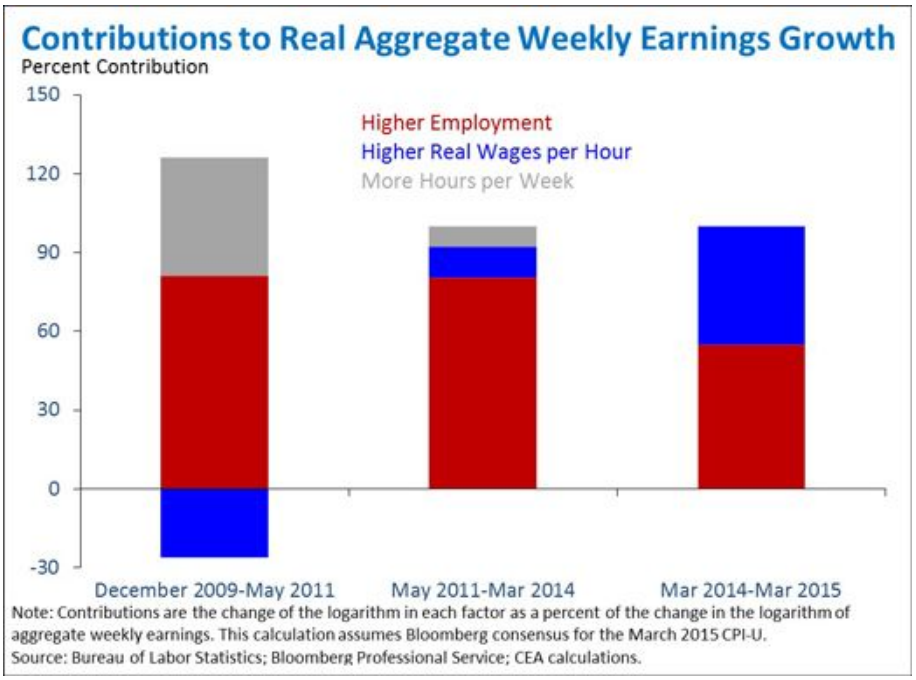
The Employment Situation in March

Posted by Jason Furman on April 3, 2015 at 09:30 AM EST

The March employment report reflects a pace of monthly job growth below the recent trend, coming on the heels of February's strong report. The unemployment rate was stable, broader measures of unemployment fell, and hourly earnings continued their rise. A range of factors including the weather and the global economic slowdown have affected economic data for the first quarter. The President has been clear that he will continue to push for policies including investments in infrastructure and relief from the sequester that would help ensure the strong underlying longer-term trends persist.

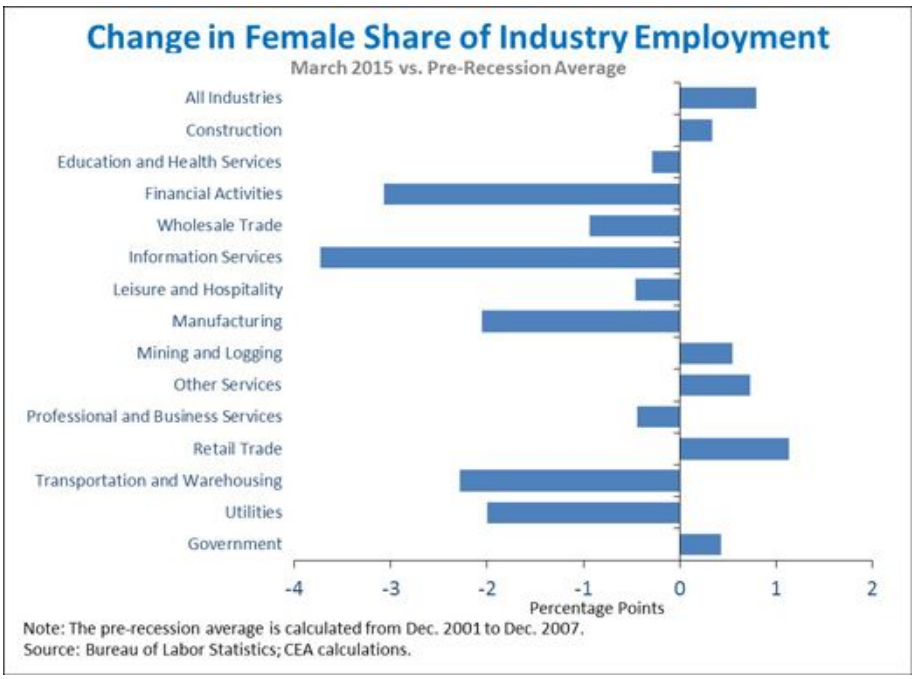
FIVE KEY POINTS IN TODAY'S REPORT FROM THE BUREAU OF LABOR STATISTICS

1. The private sector has added 12.1 million jobs over 61 straight months of job growth, extending the longest streak on record. Today we learned that total nonfarm payroll employment rose by 126,000 in March, driven by a 129,000 increase in private-sector employment. This particular month's job gains were below the recent trend, as job growth in a number of industries slowed somewhat (see point 5). Over the past twelve months, the private sector has added 3.1 million jobs, nearly the highest year-over-year growth in the recovery so far.



2. Real aggregate weekly earnings have risen nearly 5 percent over the last twelve months. Real aggregate earnings track the purchasing power of total wages and salaries paid to U.S. private-sector employees, reflecting the combined effects of rising employment, rising wages, and a longer workweek. Aggregate earnings are nearly 7 percent above their pre-crisis peak. Indeed, they have recovered nearly twice their losses during the recession. Year-over-year aggregate earnings growth trended about 2-3 percent at an annual rate in recent years, but has risen to 5 percent year-over-year in recent months as hourly earnings have begun to rise (see point 3).

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.



3. Over the past twelve months, rising real hourly earnings accounted for nearly half the increase in real aggregate weekly earnings. The large contribution of rising hourly earnings is a recent trend. Aggregate earnings reached a trough in December 2009, and over the following year-and-a-half, real hourly wages declined. The aggregate earnings increase during that early period was driven by a combination of rising employment and a longer workweek. Over the next three years, both hourly earnings and the workweek were largely stable, with rising employment accounting for 80 percent of the growth in aggregate earnings. Real wage growth over the past year has been a major contributor to the speed-up in aggregate earnings, due to both rising nominal wages and slowing consumer price growth as oil prices have declined. While the recent progress is encouraging, there is more work to do to ensure that real earnings growth is sustained and shared with a broad range of American families.

4. The overall share of jobs held by women rose from an average of 48.5 percent in 2001-2007 to 49.3 percent in March 2015. This 0.8 percentage point increase masks substantial variation within industries. Female workers shifted out of smaller industries like financial activities and information services where the female share declined by 3.1 and 3.7 percentage points, respectively and into higher-employment industries like retail trade. Women's share of employment also increased somewhat in the government sector, where 57 percent of workers are female. Accordingly, women were disproportionately affected by the cuts to government employment that occurred between 2010 and 2013, but they have also disproportionately benefited from net job growth in this sector since mid-2013.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

5. Job growth in a number of industries fell below recent trends in March. Looking over the 61-month streak of private-sector job growth, March was an especially weak month for mining and logging (-11,000), manufacturing (-1,000), leisure and hospitality (+13,000), and construction (-1,000). The weakness in mining and logging is likely attributable in large part to the recent decline in oil prices. March was a stronger than usual month in retail trade (+26,000) and health care and social assistance (+30,000). Across the 17 industries shown below, the correlation between the most recent one-month percent change and the average percent change over the last twelve months rose to 0.51 from 0.13 last month, remaining somewhat below the average correlation over the past two years.

As the Administration stresses every month, the monthly employment and unemployment figures can be volatile, and payroll employment estimates can be subject to substantial revision. Therefore, it is important not to read too much into any one monthly report and it is informative to consider each report in the context of other data as they become available.

Hi Ami –

I hope this mail finds you well.

Wanted to follow up on a request to the President made by Sigmar Gabriel, the German Foreign Minister and Chairman of the SPD. Gabriel is asking if President Clinton might right a short note for a publication being produced to honor former German Chancellor, Gerhard Schroder, on his 70th Birthday.

The Ebert Stiftung seems to have sent this request via a standard press application email, and have received the rejection email from one of your interns. I'm wondering if there is any way you might be able to reconsider this request. I've attached the original letter from Sigmar Gabriel to this letter, along with a courtesy translation.

Let me know if there is anything you can do to help. Schroder was influential in helping to spread the Third Way philosophy in Europe, and hosted the last Progressive Governance Summit that President attended while in office.

Many thanks in advance –

Matt

Dear Matt,

we are out of luck reaching out to the Clinton Foundation directly with the question if President Clinton might contribute a brief note to a publication honoring Gerhard Schroeder on his 70th birthday.

This is a long tradition in Germany and it is highly valued if someone is willing to take this upon himself. Do you see any alternative way of reaching President Clinton with this special request?

I am up for a meeting, can't do it tomorrow, but would have time on Monday if that works for you!

John,

Jim Jones came to see me yesterday and we talked for about an hour. I encouraged him to give the President-elect a final yes.

He mentioned that he had suggested Arnold Punaro to you all as a candidate for Deputy Secretary. I know Punaro pretty well, respect and like him, and think he would be a viable candidate for you all to consider along with others.

Bob

Statement of Campaign Chairman John Podesta on Benghazi Committee Election Year Delay

The U.S. House Select Committee on Benghazi announced today that it would delay its findings about the 2012 tragedy to "just months before the 2016 presidential election ." Hillary for America Campaign Chairman John Podesta released the following statement in response.

"For years, Republicans have been using the terrible tragedy that occurred in Benghazi to score political points, but today their true motivation has become undeniably clear. Republicans' refusal to finish this investigation until election time is the most telling evidence yet that their investigation is solely about playing politics in the 2016 presidential campaign.

"This is just the latest example in a broad concerted effort by Republicans and their allies to launch false attacks against one of Hillary Clinton's greatest strengths in this campaign – her stature and deep experience on foreign affairs and national security."

"There have already been 21 congressional hearings, five independent or bipartisan reports, and millions of tax dollars spent in the process of investigating this 4 year old tragedy. The only conclusion to come out of all of this is that all of the Republicans' claims and conspiracy theories have no basis in fact. This investigation would now be longer than the investigations of Iran-Contra, the Kennedy Assassination, Watergate and 9/11.

"Hillary Clinton has already spent five hours testifying at two congressional committee hearings but, as she's been saying since November 2014, she's happy to do it again. Unfortunately, Republicans will only accept her testimony if it's done behind closed doors, where the American public is unable to see their true, politically motivated intentions.

"Sadly, Republicans have been politicizing this tragedy since day one."

Subject:	[big campaign] Stimulus hypocrites

Today's Progress Report has a good summary of all the stimulus hypocrites who are bashing the measure one day and trying to take credit for its benefits the next:

CONGRESSIONAL HYPOCRITES: Several House Republicans who opposed the Recovery Act quickly returned to their districts to tout projects that it funded. Stimulus opponent Rep. Joseph Cao (R-LA) met with New Orleans Mayor Ray Nagin (D) and Transportation Secretary Ray LaHood recently to solicit stimulus money for streetcar expansions and road repairs. Cao proudly boasted that he is looking "at federal monies that the state has and channeling more of that money to the district ." Sen. Mitch McConnell (R-KY) earlier this month asked for stimulus funds to be diverted into paying down the deficit rather than paying it out to states. But the same day he took credit for the construction site at Blue Grass Army Depot in Madison County, Kentucky -- a project that was funded in large part by the Recovery Act . One of the most brazen acts of hypocrisy came from House Minority Whip Rep. Eric Cantor (R-VA), who has repeatedly claimed that the stimulus is "failing " to create jobs. Earlier this month, Cantor appeared at a job fair in Midlothian, VA, to demonstrate how he is working on "long-term solutionsthat will put...Virginia workers back on the path to financial stability." But scores of jobs advertised at the jobs fair were created by the stimulus , and Chesterfield County, where the fair was being held, will receive more than $38 million in stimulus funding over the next two years.

HYPOCRITICAL GOVERNORS: Republican governors lined up to attack the Recovery Act and oppose its passage as well. Gov. Bobby Jindal (R-LA), said if he was still a member of Congress he would've voted against the stimulus and wrote an op-ed in Politico lambasting the Recovery Act's effect, calling it the "stimulus that has not stimulated." Yet the very next day, he appeared with constituents in Louisiana to present a jumbo-sized check of federal grant money authorized under the Recovery Act to residents of Vernon Parish. He later toured the state in a "Louisiana Working" tour, handing out millions of dollars of stimulus money while simultaneously attacking "Washington Spending ." Similarly, Gov. Mark Sanford (R-SC) wrote an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal last year titled "Don't Bail Out My State, " proudly boasting about being the only governor to travel to Washington to lobby against the stimulus package. Yet after the legislation was passed, Sanford changed his mind and told reporters that being against the Recovery Act "doesn't preclude taking the money ." In April, Sanford became the last governor to seek economic recovery funds.

THE STIMULUS IS WORKING: The Council of Economic Advisers, in a report released earlier this month, called the Recovery Act the "boldest countercyclical fiscal stimulus in American history " and concluded that the stimulus added nearly 500,000 jobs to the economy in the second quarter of 2009 that would not have been there without it. Sen. Olympia Snowe (R-ME), one of the few Republicans who voted in favor of the stimulus, noted last March that even "those who were opposed to the stimulus spending willsee some of the projects that are underway in their communities as they've initiated." Snowe said she believes that the effect of the spending has been to create an "amazing" number of projects in her home state. Many conservatives who opposed the stimulus or the idea of Keynesian spending in general have started to line up to defend the Recovery Act. On Aug. 7, Douglas Holtz-Eakin, who served as Sen. John McCain's (R-AZ) chief economic adviser during his 2008 campaign, told reporters that "no one would argue that the stimulus has done nothing." Three days later, Niall Ferguson of the conservative Hoover Institution said the Recovery Act "has clearly made a significant contribution to stabilizing the US economy."

MCCAIN'S ECONOMIC PLAN: MORE OF THE SAME BUSH ECONOMY

Today McCain will give a major economic speech in Denver, CO, and release his 15-page economic plan (see excerpts here). McCain's plan shows that, like Bush, McCain will offer tax breaks to millionaires and corporations while doing little for middle-class American families.

McCain supports two trillion in new tax breaks for corporations and the rich. To pay for these tax breaks, McCain will have to cut programs and services like early education, student loans, cancer research, affordable housing, and transportation by 30 percent -- adding to middle class Americans' economic burdens when they are already facing a rising cost of living.

McCain actively supports Bush's failed policies. According to Congressional Quarterly, McCain supported President Bush a majority of the time—supporting Bush as much as 100 percent in 2008 and 95 percent in 2007. [CQ Voting Studies, Accessed, 5/15/08]

John McCain is the same as George Bush on the economy. McCain's plan, like Bush's gives break after break to millionaires and wealthy corporations, but does little for middle class families.

- McCain makes Bush's tax cuts permanent, and calls for a $1.7 trillion tax cut for corporations according to a Center for American Progress Action Fund report.
    - McCain's corporate tax cuts would give $3.8 billion in tax breaks to the 5 biggest oil companies and $1.9 billion in tax breaks to the 10 biggest health insurers. Meanwhile, families who are struggling to pay the bills get much less .
    - America's top 5 oil companies Exxon, Shell, Valero and others would stand to receive a $3.8 billion tax break, while the average family might save $44.40 from McCain's gas holiday..
- Bush's failed policies have broken our economy – and McCain's policies will only make our economic crisis worse. McCain's plan not only makes Bush's tax cuts permanent, but offers massive new corporate tax cuts. McCain's plan would create the highest federal budget deficit in 25 years according to an analysis by the Center for American Progress Action Fund.
    - The Wall Street Journal reported that McCain policies will "explode deficit " or result in "unprecedented spending cuts equal to one-third of federal spending on domestic programs."
- Americans already struggling economically. Jobs numbers fell for the sixth straight month last week as 62,000 American jobs were lost in June. Unemployment remains at a four-year high . On Friday the Wall Street Journal reported that 1.6 million Americans have now been out of work for at least 6 months – up 37 percent in the last year.

days where it will act as the ice-breaking ship for Shell oil drilling rigs and its support fleet, allowing Shell to commence delayed drilling operations off the Alaska coast.

Carbon emissions from the burning of fossil fuels are warming the Arctic faster than the rest of the globe, and the Arctic Ocean is rapidly becoming ice-free. The International Energy Agency warns that over two-thirds of all proven fossil fuel reserves must remain in the ground by 2050 to avert catastrophic climate disruption. In January, the journal Nature reported that to maintain even a 50% chance of avoiding catastrophic global warming (beyond 2°C), there can be no drilling for Arctic oil. Nevertheless, Shell Oil is now exploring for even more oil in the Arctic with the permission of President Obama.

In a newly released study NASA's former top climate scientist, Dr. James Hansen, says that with a 2°C temperature increase sea levels could rise at least 10 feet as soon as the middle years of this century, inundating coastal cities and even reaching inland cities such as Portland. With 10 feet of sea level rise, the dry dock where the Fennica is scheduled to be repaired would ironically be underwater.

This drilling also poses huge risks for local marine ecosystems The Arctic is a vital breeding and feeding ground for marine life, and home to numerous indigenous peoples who rely on a healthy marine environment for their survival. Offshore Arctic oil operations pose a 75 percent chance of a spill in the Arctic, the Department of the Interior calculates. The best expert opinion is that a spill would be virtually impossible to clean up.

Dear Steering Committee Members,
Please save the date for Equitable Growth's first grantee conference: Wednesday, September 21, 2016. While plans are still tentative, we envision three panels: Doctoral grantee presentations and discussants; Academic grantee works-in-progress presentations and discussants; and featured completed research presentations. We are considering opening the final panel up to a larger audience and possibly live-streaming it.
Following the conference we will host a dinner that will include participants as well as a broader group from the policy community, think tanks and high level journalists.
The grantee conference is an opportunity for our grantees to learn from and network with one another, with Equitable Growth staff, and with you. It also provides an influential forum for us to build an equitable growth narrative. We hope you will be able to participate in at least one panel and attend the dinner. Please mark the date on your calendar and alert us to any conflicts. More details will follow!
Best,
Heather

Thanks for doing the dinner last night. It was a small group, but we raised almost $5000.00 for Hillary, so it was a good start.

I will be in Tokyo several more times between now and Nov. 2016, so please let me know if there are other Democrats I can host fundraisers around.

This was my first twme to do a fundraiser and was on very short notice. But I now know how to do it, so I next time should be able to gather more donors and raise more contributions for Hillary.

Thanks!

Glen

Subject: [big campaign] AFL-CIO Statement on Iran

For Immediate Release Contact: Eddie Vale (202) 637-5018

Statement by AFL-CIO President Sweeney On the Current Crisis in Iran
June 23, 2009

The AFL-CIO, representing over 11 million working women and men in the United States, expresses its deep concern over the immediate situation in Iran, following the contested election of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. Several people have been killed and many more wounded and injured by Iranian government forces attempting to repress massive demonstrations demanding either an annulment of the elections or a vote recount.

Our Federation, joining the International Trade Union Confederation (ITUC) and the global labor movement, calls on the Iranian authorities to cease and desist their violent repression of these peaceful demonstrations, as well as fully prosecute under due process of law all of those responsible for the tragic and reprehensible deaths and injuries.

The AFL-CIO also condemns and demands an immediate end to the continued violations of fundamental worker rights in Iran, including the recent arrest of four trade unionists and a journalist for participating in May Day rallies in Tehran - Jafar Azimzadeh, Said Youzi, Kaveh Mozaffari, Gholamreza Khani and Mehdi Farahani Shandiz. We also condemn the ongoing detention and harassment of Mansour Ossanlou and Ibrahim Medadi of the Tehran Bus Workers' Union, Farzad Kamangar of the Teachers' Union, Ali Nejati of the Sugar Workers, and Mahmoud Salehi of the Bakers' Union.

Our Federation also joins the ITUC in supporting the June 26 Day of Action: Justice for Iranian Workers, which demands the following:

. The immediate release of all imprisoned Iranian trade unionists;

. The recognition of all authentic and independent workers' organizations in Iran;

. Full ratification of and compliance with ILO Conventions 87 and 98 guaranteeing Freedom of Association and Collective Bargaining;

. And the immediate reinstatement of all unfairly dismissed Iranian workers exercising their legitimate organizational rights.

And as the 2009 ILO Conference Committee on the Application of Labor Standards concluded, Iran must fully and immediately comply with its obligations to end discrimination in employment against women, religious minorities, and other persecuted groups pursuant to Convention 111.

John --

This has been a convention of extraordinary moments. Ted Kennedy passing the torch to a new generation. Michelle Obama moving the crowd to tears. And tonight, Joe Biden will give the biggest speech of his life.

Millions of Americans are watching and counting on us to win this election and deliver real change.

They're not just counting on Barack and Joe -- they are counting on you. Hillary couldn't have said it better: "None of us can afford to sit on the sidelines."

This is our one shot, so let's roll up our sleeves -- or risk another four or eight years of the same disastrous Bush-McCain policies.

Sign up right now for events happening this week in your community -- and in Virginia, an important battleground state.

Tomorrow, Barack will accept the Democratic nomination, and supporters all across the country are getting together to be a part of this historic moment.

Then, this weekend, we'll kick off the biggest voter registration and mobilization drive in the history of politics.

Attend a Convention Watch Party this Thursday evening, and find a Weekend of Action event near you in Virginia:

http://my.barackobama.com/WOAattend

If this convention has shown us anything, it's how much energy and enthusiasm is out there -- and how much passion for change.

Voters in all 50 states are realizing what's at stake. And they're hearing Barack's message of change in every corner of the country.

Let's seize this incredible opportunity and work together to get out the vote like never before.

Attend a Convention Watch Party near you and sign up for a Weekend of Action event near you in Virginia.

Supporters like you have brought us this far, but there's still a lot work to be done.

At this crucial time in our campaign, it's never been more important to get involved.

Thanks,

Jon

Dear MoveOn member,

Ever heard that saying "truth is stranger than fiction?" What about when you just can't tell them apart?

We've started to feel that way about the news of the massive corporate spending in this election—stories so over-the-top they cold have come from The Onion.

So we created a little Reality Check Quiz. Half of the following stories are true—see if you can figure out which. Then share this to spread the word about how our democracy is being hijacked.

Thanks for all you do.

Max-

Thanks for reaching out on Secretary Clinton, her comments with respect to the debate and her relationship with the financial sector services industry. From my perspective, these relationships have been formed over 2 decades from the Secretary's past roles as First Lady, NY Senator and Secretary of State and the real reason she is garnering so much support is she is incredibly smart and experienced on the 2 main key issues which will form much of the debate on deciding our next President: the economy (jobs, wages, income inequality) and foreign policy. For example, whether you agree with her or not on Too Big Too Fail concerns, she certainly has been the only one in either party to understand that AIG/Lehman and the entire shadow banking system are not bank holding companies and thus would not be impacted by going back to Glass Steagall. She has also been the only one to understand Dodd Frank and the resolution authority rules that came out of it and has been clear that if she needed to use the "living will" provision, she would. Thus, I do not think Wall Street is taking her comments lightly.

With respect to the 9/11 comments, there is no question that Wall Street and our local and state politicians came together and formed a relationship that we will always remember out of all having the same goal of rebuilding lower Manhattan and Wall Street back to being strong and vibrant. Whether it was Mayor Giuliani, Senators Schumer and Clinton and others, everyone put partisan political on the shelf for the better of our country. Even today, I have a soft spot for Mayor Giuliani even though I could not disagree with him more on his politics, so no, I am not surprised that many support Secretary Clinton from those days of working closely with her. Lastly, I should remind you that in 2008, many of the top contributors to President Obama's campaign came from financial services (maybe half of his top 10) and I am pretty sure that no one was saying that he was going to be soft on Wall Street or that they were agreeing with his hardened tone on regulation. So, maybe just maybe, the financial services industry contributes to a candidate based on many other things than his or her profession and may look many other issues as well like immigration, education or social issues and who is truly best to run our country ….I know I do.

Hope this helps,

RW

Mr. Wolf: Here's an important little note for you on this crisp Sunday. I'm sure you saw the intense moment last night when Sec. Clinton explained her relationship to financial donors by reminding the debate audience that she represented NY after 9/11.

It's a good moment to pause and explain why some financial industry folks appreciate her. Is it because of her New York ties? Is it her financial proposals? A longtime mutual respect? Or a combination? I'd love to get on the phone (my cell's 914 645 4094) or have you send one or two sentences in the next few hours.

We're putting together a piece for Monday morning that will be really special. Thanks and best, sir, Subject: Your thoughts on Syria?

VoteVets.org The Voice of America's 21st Century Patriots

Dear John -

Several months ago, over 32,000 veterans, military family members, and VoteVets supporters signed a petition opposing a plan to send arms to the Syrian rebels.

Many of the signers believed there was no winning scenario in another nation's civil war, and that it would be impossible to keep those weapons from the hands of the rebel forces we fought in Iraq, but are now taking on President Assad in Syria.

Since then, the American intelligence community has determined with "high confidence" that the Syrian government used chemical weapons against its own people in an attack on August 21st.

With this new information, we want to know if your opinion has changed at all. Should we send cruise missiles into Syria? Would it accomplish anything if we did? Should we send arms to the rebels fighting President Assad, or should we do even more? Let us know here:

http://action.votevets.org/syria-intervention

As VoteVets supporters, veterans and military family members, we have a very unique voice in this debate.

Let us know where you stand on this issue. Your feedback will help us plan our next steps, and we'll make sure that Congress hears it before they return to vote on a measure that would authorize President Obama to use military force in Syria.

All the best,

Could we just get someone to say she quoted Duffy and Carney to them, to the effect that Wall Street had lost its way?

I worry about going down this road.

First, the remarks below make it sound like HRC DOESNT think the game is rigged -- only that she recognizes that the public thinks so. They are angry. She isn't.

Second, once you start looking at speeches, you run smack into Maggie Haberman's report for Politico on HRC's Goldman Sachs speech, in which HRC isn't quoted directly, but described as saying people shouldn't be vilifying Wall Street.

Maybe you think the Deutsche Bank speech takes the sting out of the Goldman report -- but I am concerned that the passage below will exacerbate not improve the situation.

Reviving this thread because AP is working on a story similar to Pat Healy's article in Sunday's NYT about HRC's "Wall Street image problem." The reporter, Lisa Lerer, plans specifically to note that her paid speeches to banks were closed-press affairs, and transcripts are not available. She is asking if we wish to characterize her remarks in any way.

I think we could come up with a vanilla characterization that challenges the idea that she sucked up to these folks in her appearances, but then use AP's raising of this to our advantage to pitch someone to do an exclusive by providing at least the key excerpts from this Deutsche Bank speech. In doing so, we could have the reporting be sourced to a "transcript obtained by [news outlet]" so it is not confirmed as us selectively providing one transcript while refusing to share others.

> Following up on the conversation this morning about needing more arrows in our quiver on Wall Street, I wanted to float one idea. In October 2014, HRC did a paid speech in NYC for Deutsche Bank. I wrote her a long riff about economic fairness and how the financial industry has lost its way, precisely for the purpose of having something we could show people if ever asked what she was saying behind closed doors for two years to all those fat cats. It's definitely not as tough or pointed as we would write it now, but it's much more than most people would assume she was saying in paid speeches. (Full transcript is attached and key riff is pasted below.) Perhaps at some point there will be value in sharing this with a reporter and getting a story written. Upside would be that when people say she's too close to Wall Street and has taken too much money from bankers, we can point to evidence that she wasn't afraid to speak truth to power. Downside would be that we could then be pushed to release transcripts from all her paid speeches, which would be less helpful (although probably not disastrous). In the end, I'm not sure this is worth doing, but wanted to flag it so you know it's out there.

...Now, Jacques was talking about Eleanor Roosevelt, and I hope a lot of you have seen the extraordinary Ken Burns documentary series on PBS about the Roosevelts. It's just riveting. And you should see it if you haven't, because it tells stories and shows pictures that have never been seen before of Teddy Roosevelt and Franklin Roosevelt and Eleanor Roosevelt.

But Eleanor Roosevelt in particular is someone that I admire as one of my predecessors, and I adore the book that Jacque's mother-in-law has written about the relationship that she and her late husband, who was Eleanor's personal physician, had with Eleanor Roosevelt.

And you look at the documentary and you really are struck once again how every generation has to do what it can to make sure that economic opportunity is broadly shared and upward mobility remains at the core of the American dream and experience.

I mean, Teddy Roosevelt said it well. His commonsense slogan, the square deal, captured the American imagination and still resonates today.

Just think about the changes that were going on at the turn of the last century: technological transformation, growing economic inequality, the steady accumulation of vast power and wealth in the hands of a select few.

Roosevelt was a Republican from the party of big business, but he resisted both the elites who sought to protect their gilded age advantages and the rising tide of populist anger that threatened to sweep the nation. Instead, he stood up for the level playing field, no special deals, just a fair shot for everybody willing to get out there and work hard.

I think that's a message worth recalling today when so many hardworking American families, and I add European families feel like they're falling further and further behind, while they see, in their view, the playing field becoming more unlevel, and feeling as though it doesn't matter how hard they work because the game is rigged against them.

Now, to me this is not just about fairness, although I think that's an important principle. We now know, based on research done by the IMF and others, that income inequality holds back growth for the entire economy. There is no more important driver of growth around the world than the purchasing power of American consumers. That is once again becoming clear as we move forward more dynamically than a lot of our friends and allies are economically.

Stagnating wages translate into fewer customers, and that's not a new insight. Just ask Henry Ford who first articulated it.

And it's no surprise that many Americans feel frustrated, some even angry, as you probably see in news coverage. And a lot of that anger has been directed at the financial industry.

Now, it's important to recognize the vital role that the financial markets play in our economy and that so many of you are contributing to. To function effectively those markets and the men and women who shape them have to command trust and confidence, because we all rely on the market's transparency and integrity.

So even if it may not be 100 percent true, if the perception is that somehow the game is rigged, that should be a problem for all of us, and we have to be willing to make that absolutely clear. And if there are issues, if there's wrongdoing, people have to be held accountable and we have to try to deter future bad behavior, because the public trust is at the core of both a free market economy and a democracy.

So it is in everyone's interest, most of all those of you who play such a vital role in the global economy, to make sure that we maintain and where necessary rebuild trust that goes beyond correcting specific instances of abuse of fraud.

Last year, the head of the Chicago Mercantile Exchange, Terry Duffy, published an op-ed in the Wall Street Journal that caught my attention. He wrote, and I quote, "I'm concerned that those of us in financial services have forgotten who we serve, and that the public knows it. Some Wall Streeters can too easily slip into regarding their work as a kind of moneymaking game divorced from the concerns of Main Street."

We heard a similar point from a more global perspective this spring at a conference in London on inclusive capitalism organized by my friend, Lynn Rothschild, who's here with us tonight. Mark Carney, the Governor of the Bank of England, offered what we in America might call straight talk about how the financial industry has lost its way and how to earn back public confidence.

And I think his words are worth both quoting and thinking about. Here's what he said. "The answer starts from recognizing that financial capitalism is not an end in itself, but a means to promote investment, innovation, growth and prosperity. Banking is fundamentally about intermediation, connecting borrowers and savers in the real economy. In the run-up to the crisis, banking became about banks not businesses, transactions not relations, counterparties not clients."

And then Mark Carney went on to outline proposals for stronger oversight, both within the industry and by government authorities, but he noted "Integrity can neither be bought nor regulated. Even with the best possible framework of codes, principles, compensation schemes and market discipline, financiers must constantly challenge themselves to the standard they uphold."

So this is a time when for all kinds of reasons trust in government, trust in business has eroded. And I believe that it has to be rebuilt, not only by those in offices in Washington or Albany but by so many of you.

Over the years, I've had the privilege of working with many talented, principled, smart people who make their living in finance, especially when I was Senator from New York. Many of you here were my constituents, and I worked hard to represent you well. And I saw every day how important a well-functioning financial system is to not only the American economy but the global economy.

That's why as Senator I raised early warnings about the subprime mortgage market and called for regulating derivatives and other complex financial products because even among my smartest supporters and constituents I never understood what they were telling me when they tried to explain what they were.

I also called for closing the carried interest loophole, addressing skyrocketing CEO pay and other issues that were undermining that all important link between Wall Street and Main Street.

Remember what Teddy Roosevelt did. Yes, he took on what he saw as the excesses in the economy, but he also stood against the excesses in politics. He didn't want to unleash a lot of nationalist, populistic reaction. He wanted to try to figure out how to get back into that balance that has served America so well over our entire nationhood.

Today, there's more that can and should be done that really has to come from the industry itself, and how we can strengthen our economy, create more jobs at a time where that's increasingly challenging, to get back to Teddy Roosevelt's square deal. And I really believe that our country and all of you are up to that job...

Subject:	BEWARE: our youth are self-interested

I would like to see Hillary as President. Let me tell a short story that taught me something about our youth and probably it is well know everywhere—but true idealists may be slow to believe it.

Back in the early seventies Candidate Richard Nixon was explaining that he had a (secret) way to end the Viet Nam conflict—so please vote for him to see his great thinking. At that time I was just a few years into my professorial career and was quite idealistic and at this time the college student bodies everywhere in the USA and in Europe were in fierce open rebellion.
They literally took over University buildings and set up camps therein. And this was at some of our finest schools—Stanford was one.Faculties were often very sympathetic or at the very least —tolerant.. On reflection, I was also against our “warlike” policies—but wondered how Nixon was going to take care of the situation.

What Nixon did was relatively suddenly end the draft and the conscription. And the next day the entire "revolutionary mood” of the draft age youngsters changed and their riots ended overnight.So their mood,as I felt, was entirely self-interested or selfish. Once they saw that they would not be drafted, they turned again into sweet young folks going to college.

What I learned from this was/is that people vote mostly in their own selfish interests. They are not thinking of the greater good for the society or for some lofty ideal. Hopefully, you are all working collectively to figure what are the three or so things that the 18 to 40 year old people want— then please promise it to them and win the election.

Good Luck,
Nicholas George

RE: Senator McCain: The Same Old Bush Policies

Tonight, Senator McCain travels to Louisiana to give a major address where he will try to paint himself as an agent of change and "a different kind of Republican."[i] Yet, McCain is not so different. President George W. Bush used the same tactic in 2000. "The Arizona senator is not the first to try to persuade voters that he is a different kind of Republican. That was an underlying message of Bush's 2000 campaign..." Dan Balz of the Washington Post wrote in April.[ii]

In August of 2000, Bush traveled to Dillard University in New Orleans as part of an effort "to convince traditionally Democratic minority voters to give the Bush-Cheney ticket a second look."[iii] Discussing the visit, Bush spokesman Tucker Eskew said, "George W. Bush is a different kind of Republican."[iv]

Tonight, McCain will try to portray his decades in Washington and his embrace of Bush's policies as "real change"[v] - but instead of being "a different kind of Republican," McCain is just like Bush.

Hours after Katrina had made landfall as a Category 4 hurricane, and after the levees had breached....John McCain and President Bush were enjoying birthday cake for McCain's 69th birthday.

THE SAME OLD BUSH POLICIES: MCCAIN JUST LIKE BUSH

MCCAIN JUST LIKE BUSH ON THE ISSUES:

Bush has said McCain "would be the best to carry forth his agenda."[vi]

McCain has supported Bush 100% of the time this year. According to Congressional Quarterly, McCain supported President Bush a majority of the time--supporting Bush as much as 100 percent in 2008 and 95 percent in 2007.[vii]

- "Their positions are virtually indistinguishable," said Thomas Mann, a senior fellow at the Brookings Institution, a Washington research group. `That makes him vulnerable to the charge that, `If you liked President George Bush, you will love President John McCain.'" [Bloomberg , 4/30/08]
- "...the differences between McCainism and Bushism are very narrow" [USA Today Column , 2/12/08]

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- "One drawback for McCain: On three major issues -- Iraq, the economy and health care -- he has embraced Bush's unpopular policies." [Bloomberg , 4/30/08]

Foreign Policy

- "Meet John 'Dubya' McCain; If you like George Bush's foreign policy, you'll love the GOP's current candidate." [Los Angeles Times Op-Ed, 4/23/08]
- "The Man Who Would Be Bush" [The Nation , 4/16/08]
- "If you liked the second Bush term...you will find much to admire in a Commander-in-Chief McCain" [National Review, 4/5/08]
- "...he has been Bush's staunchest supporter on Iraq" [Bloomberg , 4/30/08]

Economy

- "George W. McCain" [Boston Globe Editorial , 4/15/08]
- "Version 2.0 of Bush's 'compassionate conservative' campaign" [Washington Post , 4/24/08]
- "But a major component of his economic plan -- like those of Presidents Bush and Reagan -- centered on tax cuts." [New York Times , 4/16/08]
- "John McCain famously opposed President Bush's tax cuts a few years ago, saying they would irresponsibly swell the budget deficit. Now the Arizona senator not only supports extending those cuts indefinitely, he is backing more than $200 billion a year in new breaks." [Wall Street Journal , 4/16/08]
- "Sen. John McCain will propose today that affluent seniors pay more for government-provided drug benefits as a way to control health-care spending...The proposal is similar to a controversial one put forth last fall by President Bush..." [Washington Post , 4/15/08]

Health Care

- "McCain: Just like Bush's plan?" [MSNBC First Read , 4/30/08]
- "McCain's proposal is similar to one that Bush put forth in his 2007 State of the Union address. That plan... flopped in Congress, failing to get even a committee hearing." [Washington Post , 4/30/08]
- "His proposal to move away from employer-based coverage was similar to one that President Bush pushed for last year, to little effect." [New York Times , 4/30/08]
- "His plan, parts of which are similar to a failed effort by President Bush last year, embraces a Republican approach to an issue long dominated by Democrats." [Wall Street Journal , 4/30/08]

Judges

- McCain "pledged to nominate judges similar to the ones President Bush has placed on the bench. The presumptive Republican presidential nominee said that Chief Justice John G. Roberts Jr. and Justice Samuel A. Alito Jr. 'would serve as the model for my own nominees, if that responsibility falls to me,'" [Washington Post , 5/7/08]
- "Mr. McCain's speech was a clear embrace of the judicial philosophy of President Bush" [New York Times , 5/7/08]
- "John McCain pledged to continue President Bush's drive to push the federal judiciary to the right" [Wall Street Journal, 5/7/08]

AMERICANS AGREE:

- According to a recent NBC/Wall Street Journal poll , "43 percent of registered voters say they have major concerns that McCain is too closely aligned with the current administration."

Subject: Relentless ... Sestak 42% - Specter 41%!

Dear John,

A just-released Quinnipiac poll (and we now believe the final poll to be released before the polls open tomorrow) has the race:

> Sestak 42% - Specter 41%, with 16% undecided.

Quinnipiac's pollster said "the race is too close to call!" We need your help, this race is so close!

Both the NY Times and Pittsburgh Post Gazette this morning called our grass-roots campaign "relentless" for its passion and drive against a 30-year incumbent who is backed by the Washington and Pennsylvania establishments.

And CBS News is out with its own report: "Why is Joe Sestak surging over Arlen Specter: The Answer in one day of campaigning":

> "It was only one day in a long campaign, but it showed the sharp differences in style between upstart Joe Sestak and incumbent Arlen Specter …
> … on Friday, it was Sestak who was doing most of the retail campaigning, making 11 stops around Philadelphia starting at 6:30am, handing out business cards, and even telling one man he encountered that he would try to help his wife who was arrested the night before (he was eventually passed off to a staffer).
> Specter, by contrast, stood at a podium most of the day with the usual cast of political characters."

While our campaign IS relentless and energetic, Politico just reported "Pennsylvania's Democratic Senate primary remains balanced on a knife's edge a day before the election!"

We need one final contribution from everyone - as much as you can afford - to win this race! Please help us!

Let's have no regrets, on Wednesday morning, what might have been!

Let's bring it on home!

Best regards,
Rich Sestak
Campaign Director

P.S. Over the weekend our "relentless" army of passionate and dedicated volunteers (over 5,000 and growing) contacted over 30,000 Democratic households as we launched our "Get-Out-The-Vote" operation (the last stage of "Operation True Democrat", our designed strategy initiated 59 days ago to elect Joe). Let's win this!

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE
September 15, 2009

INSURANCE AND HMO INDUSTRIES SPEND NEARLY $700,000 PER DAY TO KILL HEALTH CARE REFORM MEASURES

Industries have spent $585.7 million since 2007 on lobbying and campaign contributions

Washington, D.C. – A campaign finance watchdog's analysis of insurance and HMO political contributions and lobbying expenses found the industries spent $126,430,438 over the first half of 2009 and $585,725,712 over the past two and a half years to influence public policy and elected officials. The group, Public Campaign Action Fund, found that in the first part of 2009, the industries were spending money at nearly a $700,000 a day clip to influence the political process and that the monthly pace of political spending this year has increased by nearly $400,000 over the average spent per month in the previous two years. (more)

Please click the link above to access your mobile boarding pass(es). To quickly retrieve and display your mobile boarding pass, you should save the image on your mobile device.

Once at the airport, show this mobile boarding pass:
- at Curbside where available, Self-Service Kiosks or the American Airlines counter if you are checking baggage,
- at the security checkpoint,
- during the boarding of your flight.

If you forget your cell phone or mobile device, or delete the link to your boarding pass by mistake, you can print a paper boarding pass at a Self Service Machine or American Airlines Ticket Counter.
For your convenience, a paper boarding pass has also been attached to this email. If you have access to a printer, you can print your paper boarding pass(es) before proceeding to the airport. The attached document is not a mobile boarding pass and will not be accepted at the security checkpoint if displayed from your mobile device.

Thank you for choosing American Airlines.

John-

President Trumka's office just called me to see if you could talk. When you weren't around to jump on the phone he got on the line and delivered this message to me to give to you:

He would like to give a huge thank you to YOU and HRC for the $30 billion dollar aid plan to ensure that coal miners and their families get the benefits they've earned and respect they deserve. He said it shows a great sensitivity for these issues that no other politician in this country is showing right now.

If you'd like to follow up with him he's happy to talk. If not, he's happy just knowing you received this message.

Nikki sent over our coal communities package to his office yesterday.

Thanks,
Milia

We know there is concern about the commute home, given the weather we had this morning. In view of those concerns, Georgetown University Law Center offices should feel free to allow non-essential personnel to leave as early as 4:00 pm today.

Please exercise caution due to the icy conditions on the road during your drive home tonight and back to work tomorrow morning.

Best wishes for safe travels,

Subject: Unpredictable

Dear John,

On November 2, we have a choice. Do we move New York and our country forward or do we take two giant steps back?

When Joe DioGuardi won the Republican nomination, he immediately ratcheted up the smears and distortions and ginned up the right-wing media to go after me.

But their attacks don't deter me. I'm not going to give an inch to this wave of ultraconservative vitriol that has overtaken our nation and is now at our very own doorstep. I'm going to fight even harder.

Please, join me in this fight. It's a fight for our closely held beliefs, our wonderful state, and our nation as a whole. I need your help to stay on the airwaves, put more volunteers on the streets and keep up our momentum as we race to the finish on November 2.

Click here to rush $250, $500 or more to my campaign and help me raise $50,000 by midnight October 15. We're too close to the end to let up now. We've got to keep fighting the lies and distortions.

We've all seen how unpredictable this election has been. There have been so many surprises during the primaries, with out-of-the-mainstream candidates beating out more moderate, experienced voices. That tells me that we can't take anything for granted. Whether our poll numbers are up or whether they're down, we've got to keep going.

My campaign has held steady throughout this race, and right now we have a rock solid strategy guaranteed to reach every corner of the state and bring out Democratic voters on Election Day. But the only way we can execute that strategy is with your help.

The Republicans are relying on shady, third-party donors to bankroll their campaigns. I believe in transparency when it comes to governing and when it comes to campaigning. I believe in relying on the people I serve to fund my candidacy. So please, come through for me today just like you've been doing all along. I need you during this important homestretch.

Click here to make a donation right now to my campaign and help me meet my goal of raising $50,000 by midnight October 15. We need to stay strong during this final push.

We've accomplished so much in less than two years, but there's so much left to do. Let's not let our progressive movement come to a standstill. Help me keep moving forward by making a contribution today.

Sincerely,
Kirsten Gillibrand

Nancy and I realized that this is a milestone month for us. Exactly 40 years ago, we moved to Washington so I could work for Senator Gaylord Nelson. We'd like to celebrate the occasion by bringing together the friends who have meant to most to us over these many years. We hope that you'll join us on Sunday, November 1, from 4:00-6:00 pm.

Since this is a political season, we thought we would mark our personal anniversary with an exciting political event. One of our friends, Karyn Strickler, a superb public interest advocate, has founded Vote Climate PAC, a Super PAC focused on supporting Congressional candidate who favor bold action to combat climate change, and opposing those candidates who persist in climate change denial. We have invited Karyn as a guest speaker, and we think you'll admire the work she's doing on what is an existential issue. This is a fundraiser for Vote Climate PAC---no advance commitments required, but please bring your checkbooks in case you're impressed!

As an added attraction, Allan Lichtman, the noted political historian (who doubles as Karyn's husband), will share his unsurpassed insights into the presidential election. As you may know, Allan is the author of "The 13 Keys to the Presidency," and he has unfailingly predicted the winner of the popular vote in every presidential election since 1984.

Nancy and I would love to see you on November 1. Please rsvp to ira@shapiroglobal.com<mailto:ira@shapiroglobal.com>.

All our best,
Ira

Subject: The fact about right-wing extremism

THINKPROGRESS

Friday's planned parenthood shooting is a chilling reminder that despite Islamophobic rhetoric, the facts show that you are actually 7 times more likely to be killed by a right-wing extremist than a Muslim terrorist. Ted Cruz, meanwhile, responded to the Colorado shooting with a bizarre characterization of the shooter. And while most Americans were enjoying their Thanksgiving holiday, some people were hard at work -- but forcing them to miss family time doesn't appear to have paid out for their employers.

You Are More Than 7 Times As Likely To Be Killed By A Right-Wing Extremist Than By Muslim Terrorists

Friday afternoon, one week after elected officials all over the country tried to block Syrian refugees from entering their states in an apparent effort to fight terrorism, a white man in Colorado committed what appears to be an act of terrorism...(read more)

Valerie, John, all, The Global Child Nutrition Foundation will be honoring Sec. Vilsack on April 16th in coordination with the Chicago Council on Global Affairs. Attached is the Announcement. As a part of the Tribute, the Foundation puts together a program book with letters of tribute. Might the President and/or First Lady consider adding a letter? (Needless to say, it would be special if either could attend. It is at the Reagan Center)

The award will be presented by Raj Shah, last year's honoree. (Even though Raj is leaving.) Raj is familiar with the quality of the event.

Happy to answer any questions, thank you very much, Marshall

All,

In an effort to make sure we are all on the same page and everyone feels included in the conversation, we would like to have a conference call to discuss the funding needs of the various organizations doing the messaging and mobilization work for 2008. The goal of the call is to have all of the this information in one place so that we can better connect potential funders with the groups.

Participants

Frank Smith
Greg Speed
Carl Pope
John Stocks
John Podesta
David Brock
Rob Stein
Cristina Uribe
Mary Pat Bonner

We would like to do the call on Friday. Please let me know what time works best for you.

Not forwarding for our 4:15 pm call, but sending these so you have a chance to review later.

We sent Harrison a draft of the memo (before the most recent draft), and these are the comments he sent us this AM. I just got to Richmond and had a chance to review, and while he's one draft behind, many of his points are still relevant.

Learn how to pass along your assets through smart estate planning

Vanguard

Vanguard Flagship Services®

Let's talk trusts and estate planning

Dear John D Podesta,

You've worked hard to manage your investments and accumulate wealth. That's why it's so important to plan for an effective transition of your wealth to your loved ones, favorite charities, or both. If you don't plan, a surprising amount of your wealth can be lost—instead of being passed along to the people and charities you care for most.

In fact, according to the Institute for Preparing Heirs, 70% of families fail to successfully transfer their wealth to the next generation and beyond. This research has shown that the vast majority of beneficiaries lose control of the transferred wealth through bad investments, poor money management, family feuding, and other causes.

That's a sobering statistic, but I'm here to help you join the 30% of families who enjoy a successful transfer of assets. To that end, I'd like to highlight these helpful excerpts from our recent webcast on trust and estate planning:

- What you should know about trusts and wills
- Why you should talk to your heirs
- Revocable and irrevocable trusts

Let's start a conversation

If you'd like to talk more about this topic or anything else that's on your mind, feel free to email me or schedule an appointment with me. If you'd like to schedule an appointment, you can use our online appointment scheduler to choose a convenient time to speak. Simply log on to your account at vanguard.com , locate my contact information on the right side of the page, and select Create/edit appointment to choose a date and time for me to call you. I'm available on business days from 8:30 a.m. to 5 p.m.

- Even the Conservative U.S. Chamber of Commerce Admits Recession is Imminent

Do Bush's Allies in Congress See a Need for a 2nd Economic Boost Yet?

"I have serious doubts about whether we really need a second stimulus" -- House Minority Leader John A. Boehner, R-Ohio [Congressional Quarterly, 7/31/08]

Washington D.C. – On Tuesday, September 9th, 2008 at 11:45 a.m. EDT, Americans United for Change will host a press conference call with U.S. House Democratic Caucus Chairman Rahm Emanuel and leading labor and progressive organizations to highlight the urgent need for a second major economic recovery package and announce details of an aggressive campaign effort to push one through Congress. The campaign comes on the heels of the latest disappointing Labor Department report, which found the jobless rate spiking to a 5-year high after U.S. employers cut 84,000 more jobs in August. August was the eighth straight month of negative job growth under the Bush economy, bringing the total lost jobs this year to 605,000.

Turning the economy back in the right direction will require a comprehensive legislative effort that includes an extension of unemployment insurance benefits; low-income home heating assistance; support for low-income health services; an expansion of the food stamp program; increased aid to states and localities to prevent cuts in social services, schools, public safety, police and firefighters; and transportation infrastructure improvements that would create well over 100,000 new jobs.

Democratic leadership in the U.S. House and Senate are expected to move forward on another comprehensive economic recovery package this month that will likely include these elements.

Groups leading the campaign for economic recovery will call on Bush's allies in Congress to take responsibility for rubberstamping the President's failed policies that have put the U.S. economy on an imminent path towards recession and support a badly needed boost for the struggling families in their districts who have lost their jobs, healthcare, economic security and even hope, as a result of the Bush economy.

Bank of America or America of the Banks?

Supreme Court Gives Wall Street Banks, Wal-Mart, and other Large Corporations Green Light to Buy Elections

Washington, DC/Denver, CO: For more than sixty years federal law has banned corporations from spending their treasury funds directly on elections. With today's decision in Citizens United v. FEC, the Roberts Court turned back the clock. Campaign reform advocates say this sets the stage for a deluge of corporate money in politics, and threatens to upend the role of citizens as the central force in our democracy.

Progressive Future launched a letter to President Obama and Congress today, which reads "No more Supreme Court justices who believe corporations have the same rights as citizens!" People can sign the letter at https://www.progressivefuture.org/citizens-united.

Progressive Future Program Director Adam Lioz issued the following statement:

"Thanks to the Roberts Court, mega-banks that are using billions of our bailout dollars for obscene bonuses can now use our money to help place their hand-picked candidates into the halls of power.

We've seen what happens when Wall Street is accountable to no one. Now we'll see what happens when our elected representatives are directly accountable to Wall Street.

Bank of America should serve its customers and stay out of politics. But, today's decision could turn us into an America of the Banks, where our elected officials serve huge corporations instead of ordinary citizens.

The corporation that sells the most widgets shouldn't get to pick the next president. But today the Roberts Court paved the way for huge conglomerates to use their vast wealth to drown out the voices of ordinary citizens.

Through lobbying, corporate PACs, and massive advertising budgets, corporations already exert too much influence on American politics. Today's ruling guts one of the last remaining bulwarks of citizen power.

Can Goldman Sachs walk into a polling place and vote for a U.S. senator? Of course not, so why should we let big banks, or other corporations, have even more influence over who represents us, by spending unlimited money to put company-owned candidates into elected office?

Health insurance companies spent $641,000 every day lobbying against reform in Congress. Now, for a few days' expense, they can fund high-dollar campaigns to put their executives and advocates directly into Congress. Who needs lobbying when your cronies control the levers of power?

This decision is a slap in the face to ordinary citizens, and a victory for the Chamber of Commerce and Republican Leader Mitch McConnell, who filed briefs calling for today's result.

WellPoint Insurance and other corporations don't have the same rights as citizens. The vast majority of Americans agree. Unfortunately five members of the Supreme Court take another view."

Lioz noted that today's decision overrules not just 2003's McConnell v. FEC and 1990's Austin v. Michigan Chamber of Commerce, but also contravenes the logic of a unanimous 1982 decision upholding Congress' right to regulate the political activity of corporations differently than that of individual citizens (FEC v. National Right to Work Committee).

Progressive Future's analysis of the Citizens United v. FEC decision is available here .

Subject:	Introducing Georgetown's New Title IX Coord inator Laura Cutway

GEORGETOWN UNIVERSITY

Dear Members of the Georgetown University Community,

I am pleased to inform you that Laura Cutway has joined the staff of the Office of Institutional Diversity & Equity and Affirmative Action (IDEAA) effective January 11, 2016 as the University's first full-time Title IX Coordinator following a lengthy national search. As you may know, for several years I have served as the University's Title IX Coordinator in addition to my other duties. I am pleased that Georgetown is now among a select group of universities to have a full-time dedicated Title IX Coordinator.

As the Title IX Coordinator, Laura will coordinate and implement the University's Title IX compliance efforts and strengthen a culture that supports a safe and respectful learning, working and living environment. This includes monitoring and enforcing the University's sexual misconduct policy, coordinating the prompt, effective, equitable investigation and timely resolution of complaints of sexual misconduct and leading the University's education, training, prevention and outreach efforts related to Title IX and sexual misconduct. Laura's appointment as Title IX Coordinator represents a significant development as we enhance the University's efforts to foster a safe and nondiscriminatory climate for all members of our community.

Laura brings substantive experience to this significant role having served at the Georgetown University Law Center as the Sexual Assault and Relationship Violence Liaison in Health Education Services. In that capacity, Laura provided confidential advice and options for survivors of sexual assault and relationship violence, assisted students in navigating campus disciplinary and/or criminal processes, and provided educational workshops and training to raise awareness for staff, faculty and students on sexual misconduct and sexual assault.

In addition to that position, Laura served at our Law Center as Director of the Office of Disability Services where she managed a heavy caseload of law students seeking educational and other accommodations. She provided crisis support for mental and physical health emergencies and helped students navigate career resources and mentor opportunities. Laura also worked as the Learning Disability Coordinator at the Catholic University of America. Laura is an alumna of Villanova University where she earned her Bachelor of Arts degree and Masters of Science in Counseling and Human Relations.

Please join me in welcoming Laura to this new role. I look forward to introducing Laura to many of you personally as we prepare to launch our first campus Sexual Assault and Misconduct Climate Survey tomorrow.

Best regards,

Rosemary Kilkenny, Vice President
Institutional Diversity & Equity

OBAMA BIDEN

John --

In about 48 hours, we're making our final budget decisions as a campaign.

We'll look at what we have in the bank and match it up with what we think we need to do to win in these last few days.

If we can't fully fund our operations at this stage, it could be the difference between winning and losing.

Every dollar that comes in is budgeted and put to use right away, down to the last penny.

According to our records associated with this exact email address, you haven't given to this campaign yet.

Don't let this election come and go without doing your part -- donate $5 or more for the final push.

We learned last week that Mitt Romney and the Republicans have $45 million more to spend in the last leg of this campaign.

That's up to $4 million more per day at their disposal than we have right now.

We are in a strong position with five days to go. But we cannot allow ourselves to be overwhelmed so close to the very end.

There is no putting it off. I need you to get on board before it's too late. Please donate $5 or more today:

Thanks,

Messina

John – Just wanted to give you a heads-up on some of the hiring that I've done this week.

Cassandra, Melody, and I are all on payroll now. I've also hired two research assistants: Blake Roberts and Mike Mongan. Blake is a Harvard Law School graduate, 4th Circuit clerk, and has been volunteering for the campaign policy staff. Mike just finished clerking for Justice Souter. Both of them are going to start cataloguing policy promises, first the big four (energy, health care, economy, and national security) and then work their way through the other ones. I also am looking at a woman, Desiree Pipkins, who is the research director at the NAACP Legal Defense Fund. Cassandra recommended her.

I've talked to Ryan Cunningham, who was Jim Johnson's assistant in 2004, to come on in a mid- level role. Don and Melody could use him on the agency team, and Ryan handles energy issues for Glover Park, so he could staff that policy group, as well as pitch in on economy and national security (if necessary). There are also a couple of projects that cut across different working groups like the personnel database and website that could use some coordination. And he could help me manage things in general.

I've run the budget numbers, and we're well within our $300K budget (we're actually at about $275K), even with a lot of padding on the travel budget. The campaign is picking up our lease costs which has freed up a good amount of money.

On the operations front, we've convened the working group with Betsy Myers, Brad Kiley, and Katy Kale (Sherrod Brown's office manager). Brad and Katy are coming with me tomorrow to meet with GSA.

Hope this finds you well.

For information, here is Tony Blair's contribution to the special edition. I thought that it might help spur ideas for President Clinton's contributions.

As you'll note, in the opening paragraphs he credits the President with the creation of the global third way movement.

Let me know if I can be of further help.

2014, which is about when the speculation phase began. The uptick to 42 in April, was indeed up from 36 in March but was also as high as 39 in November which is well before emails or cash stories. Suggests that this could be noise and may be worth using with reporters on background when having discussions.

2) Strategically --- We have been asking ourselves if Rs are picking up something on "national security" since they keep driving it. If WSJ poll is right, they have but it has to do with GOP primary voters.

a. When asked the top one or two items they think should be the top priority for the federal gov't:

i. All addults say 1) Job Creation and econ growth; 2)National Security and terrorism; 3) Deficit and Spending; 4) Health care

ii. GOP Primary Voters from March 2012 - 1) Job creation and econ growth; 2) deficit and spending; 3)National Security, but only 20% naming as top two choice

iii. GOP Primary Voters from April 2015 - 1) National Security and terrorism, 53% naming as top two choice; 2)deficit and spending; 3) Job Creation and Econ growth

iv. Dem Primary Voters from April 2015 - 1) Job Creation and economic growth (61%); 2)Health care; (38%) 3)Climate Change (24% - 17% name it #1); National Security (30%; 13% as top)

They are playing to their base – I suspect Nat Security has popped with base because it has become their principle attack on Obama ---

New Ad: Progressive and Reform Groups Keep Pressure on Landrieu to Support Public Health Insurance Option

Democracy for America, MoveOn, and Change Congress Join Together
To Release Ad In Louisiana Calling Out Landrieu's Special-Interest Contributions

A new 60 second television ad, released today, features 2008 New Orleanian of the Year Karen Gadbois, an uninsured breast cancer survivor, asking Senator Mary Landrieu to do the right thing for her constituents and support the public health insurance option. The ad, released by Democracy for America, Change Congress and MoveOn.org Political Action, also reminds Senator Landrieu's constituents of the $1.6 million she has taken from health and insurance companies, the same industries leading the fight against a public health insurance option.

The ad will run in New Orleans and Baton Rouge for a week. It is the latest stage of an escalating campaign aimed at Landrieu that has included online and radio ads -- as well as grassroots phone calls from her constituents around the state.

"Only a few months ago Americans overwhelmingly voted for change in Washington," said Jim Dean, chair of Democracy for America. "Senator Landrieu needs to know that support for health care reform in Louisiana and all of America is both overwhelming and bi-partisan. We urge her to do the right thing and support health care reform with a strong public option."

"There are millions of Americans like Karen Gadbois who work hard and deserve a quality, affordable health care system that works from them," said Nita Chaudhary, National Campaigns and Organizing Director of MoveOn.org. "Instead of siding with big insurance companies, Senator Landrieu should be working on behalf of people like Karen to help pass real health care reform, including a robust public health insurance option."

"Is Mary Landrieu working for Louisianians or insurance companies? We can't tell," said Lawrence Lessig, Harvard law professor and founder of anti-corruption group Change Congress. "By accepting money from the special interests she regulates and then acting to benefit them instead of the needs of her constituents, she is yet another example of what I call Good Souls Corruption -- good souls trapped in a fundamentally broken campaign-finance system."

A report <http://www.campaignmoney.org/healthcare/landrieu > from watchdog group Public Campaign shows that 64% of Landrieu's health and insurance contributions are from out-of-state.

I'm a breast cancer survivor, so I know how important affordable health care is. But right now I'm uninsured, even though I work full-time, because the cost is just so high. It would literally take away half my salary.
I can't afford insurance for my daughter either. I worry about her every day -- one medical emergency would put our lives in a tailspin.

That's why I was so relieved when President Obama proposed letting people like us join a high-quality public health insurance option.	Obama's health care proposal includes the choice of a public health insurance plan. http://www.whitehouse.gov/agenda/health_care/ http://www.whitehouse.gov/the_press_office/Letter-from-President-Obama-to-Chairmen-Edward-M-Kennedy-and-Max-Baucus/
It would force private insurers to compete, making health care more affordable for families like mine. And we'd all get a choice. Those who like their insurance now could keep it.	A public insurance plan forces private companies to compete with the government option, ultimately reducing costs for consumers. See for example the Urban Institute's study "Can a Public Health Plan Increase Competition and Lower the Costs of Health Reform?," 10/3/08, available at http://www.urban.org/publications/411762.html. http://www.whitehouse.gov/the_press_office/Letter-from-President-Obama-to-Chairmen-Edward-M-Kennedy-and-Max-Baucus/

We believe in the power of small donors and grassroots action to elect progressive leaders to office and to advance a progressive agenda. We do not accept any donations over $5,000, and the average donation to MoveOn.org Political Action is under $100.

With over one million members nationwide, Democracy for America is a grassroots powerhouse working to change our country and the Democratic Party from the bottom-up. We provide campaign training, organizing resources, and media exposure so our members have the power to support progressive issues and candidates up and down the ballot.

Change Congress is a grassroots anti-corruption organization. It's website is www.Change-Congress.org .

we can make it work depending on how much you can get done in this session with larger group her drop dead end time is 5:30pm to get to a fundraiser.
we also need to do NYT prep at the end of large group similar to how we did the Globe prep the other day.
can we wrap this in an hour or 90 min?
then spend 30 min on NYT prep here.
Then small group can meet for 30-45 min at her house.
its tight and #2 small group agenda item could take a while.... other option is to do the smaller group by phone

Subject: Proposed Agenda for Tomorrow's Debate Prep

Karen and I talked, and here is what we would like to propose for tomorrow's session:

AGENDA
Debate Prep – Wednesday January 13

1:00 – 1:30 Discussion of new memo with top contrast points – focusing on key positive and contrast messages for the debate

1:30 – 2:30 "Political" Q & A (Polls, state of the race, emails, trust, etc.)

2:30 – 3:00 Race-related Q & A (Criminal justice, state of black America, poverty, etc.)

3:00 – 4:00 Domestic Q & A (Taxes, plan, health care, social security, economy, etc.)

We would propose to end at 4pm, and then have a small group (the folks on this email, plus Mandy, but probably no one else) go back over with her to her house (for 4-5pm) to:

1. Review the sensitive WJC related questions

2. Wrap up where we stand and how she feels about the political questions and any strategic issues.

The goal would to be in a place where we can mock on Thursday in NYC.

Let us know what you think.

Ron and Karen

Dear Friend,

The Koch brothers' secret conference of top right-wing funders and elected officials is wrapping up today near Vail. According to news reports coming out today, many top figures in conservative politics, such as Texas Gov. Rick Perry and Florida Gov. Rick Scott, appeared at this conference in the last two days.

Elsewhere, we see that the Koch brothers' millions are already at work.

A new television ad from Karl Rove's "Crossroads GPS" political attack group is playing around the country and in Colorado. Almost $20 million is invested in this single new campaign, including funding from the Koch brothers and other attendees of this weekend's conference in Vail. In January at their last conference, the Koch brothers assembled over $88 million to promote their war on the middle class. How much did they raise this time?

Click here to fight back--they can't buy the last word in this debate, or the truth .

At ProgressNow Colorado, we're not afraid of the Koch brothers' millions. For nearly seven years now, armed with a tiny fraction of the resources of the right wing, but with a creative group of dedicated staff and hundreds of thousands of individual Colorado progressives behind us, we've proven that a small investment in organizing and rapid response is worth more than all the TV ads they can buy.

We didn't let the right wing hold their conference to plot attacks on Medicare, Social Security, and public education in secret. We can't stop them from spending millions of dollars misinforming and scaring Colorado voters, but we can make sure that every citizen of our state hears the truth as well. 2012 will be a running battle against conservative misinformation, every day, to tell the truth about the progress that's been made in the last few years--and offer the American people a way forward.

Please click here to give what you can --either a one-time contribution, or an enduring monthly show of support--as we get ready to fight for our common values once more in 2012. And thanks! Working together, we'll show the Koch brothers that we are stronger than anything they can ever buy.

Sincerely,

Subject: Drugs and Terror Monster Conjugated Aggravation in the Middle East

SALVATION OF MANKIND BY NARCOTIC VEGETATION ERADICATION FROM THE AIR BY UNMANNED AIRCRAFT VEHICLES

Dear Mr. Vice President

Stop world Drug Inundation and Terror Conjugation.

Unmanned Aircraft Vehicles

Development proved being capable of hitting even point targets. It is well known that Afghanistan has World record of Poppy Opium Production of about 200 tons annually yielded from a cultivated 157,000 hectares area. That enormous dope amount (90% of world opium production) is in my opinion the main financial source for Terror Organizations' Weaponry Acquisition. According to my assessment, UAV could have been Redemption for Entire Mankind if being utilized as follows: 2,4 D Defoliant is splashed on the Narcotic Vegetation by air causing its desertification within several days inevitably. The following favorable consequences might have been anticipated:

1) Severing of Terror Organizations from their Financial Source that dry up with Narcotic Vegetation Desertification
2) Salvation of millions of Potential Drug Addicts from Awful Agony and Death
3) Rehabilitation of US Deterrence that has weakened considerably after Nine Eleven Horrendousness
4) Precipitation of NATO Troops Evacuation from Afghanistan as a result of UAV Bombardment Intensification resulting in Terror Suppression Reinforcement
5) Deterrence of El-Qaida Reactivation by leaving a Souvenir of dry Poppy-Opium Bushes from pulling out NATO Troops
6) I suggest having a Debate in the Senate that might hopefully lead to successful termination of the Afghan War after being stuck in its Marsh for 12 long years
7) Waiting for your Response as US friend since 1948
8) There could not have been any doubt about terminating the Armed Conflict in Afghanistan Honorably averting an Ignominious ending up as currently impending.
9) Similarly, Central American Dope Smuggling could have been drastically diminished by UAV Utilization for Narcotic Vegetation Eradication Grown on Mountainous Gradients. Very large amounts of Dope are smuggled annually into the US having found hitherto no efficacious way of overcoming that calamity
10) Please contact me by scheduling a meeting at US Embassy in Tel -Aviv for Clarifications with your experts' participation specializing in Explosives, Electronics and Aviation
11) I have got all the required specifications for getting mankind be extricated from the two conjugated calamities, Drugs inundation and Terror attacks of Innocent Population thanks to UAV activities.
12) To my great astonishment, my correspondence versus US Senate Committee on Armed Services has been irresponsive despite the extraordinary importance for entire Civilization Meanwhile as many as one billion of Muslims are threatening America encouraged by their Nine Eleven Precedent Success
13) In reminiscence, as many as 50,000 Aircraft were ordered according to Presidents' Roosevelt Ordinance after the Japanese Attack of Pearl Harbor while 7000 UAV by comparison are being idled in Storage letting the Afghan Armed Conflict be continued indefinitely.
14) Please let me explicate for US Air-Force an efficacious way emerging victorious from Afghan Entanglement in favor of Entire Mankind instead of suffering an ignominious defeat.
15) To my great surprise, US Does not exercise its Self Defense Right according to UN Charter Chapter 51 (1946), enabling Criminal Organizations of Third World Countries attacking it with impunity. Nine Eleven Catastrophe could have been averted if the US had utilized its complete Arsenal particularly UAV in high numbers instead of being kept idle in Magazines.
16) I propose meeting your Experts for UAV, Explosives and Electronics at US Embassy in Tel Aviv for thorough debate about Dual Headed Monster Decapitation in favor of beleaguered Mankind believing in great success of my Innovative Unprecedented Method as an only feasible efficacious expedient against it.

17) Is White House Correspondence Team busy to such an extent being unable responding even most important letters?
18) To my great Astonishment Dereliction of US Air Force results in smuggling of Tremendous Dope Amount from Central America via Mexico into the US with its Awful damage for many millions American's Health
19) I don't see any reason for hesitancy! The President may issue tomorrow an ordinance in order to open emergency Magazines, getting ten thousands of UAV Aloft in order to achieve Narcotic Vegetation Desertification with achievement for Posterity
20) Emerge preferably with an Upper hand honorably instead of being ignominiously defeated!
21) Despite being Non US Citizen I think to have done my best in assisting ending up
Afghan War victoriously thanks to my Innovative Narcotic Vegetation Eradication Method, however not a single word of Acknowledgement has hitherto Reached my mailbox! In my opinion, Disparagement and Ungratefulness are conjugated at least according to my feeling!
22) There could not have been any justification keeping as many as 7000 UAV unused in magazines instead of operating them against Nine Eleven Cruel enemy. Moreover, US taxpayers have already paid for that arsenal!
23) I believe Mr. Attorney General that Narcotic Vegetation Desertification Utilizing UAV is the only Feasible way of getting Mankind been extricated from the Doubling Stricken Menace Grabbing, Drug and Terror Simultaneously.
24) November election is going to be beginning of President Obama last Congress Tenure working with but if the President is being able Indicating Monumental achievements. He might have been eligible into the Parlor of great Leaders having annihilated Drugs and Terror calamities for Posterity affluence
25) Wiping out Narcotic Vegetation and launching consequently an Overwhelming
Strike on Terror Organizations by UAV Utilization might have been an Unprecedented Achievement of Entire Mankind and President Obama personally.
26) Incredibly, no reaction has come from the White House in latest four years despite My pure intention for assistance for the US as well as Entire Civilization!
27) In my opinion Nobel Institute might have contributed to a very great extent to Drug and Terror Monster Decapitation in favor of Entire Civilization.
28) Prime Minister of Israel might have contributed a great role in exerting an influence on US and Western Governments in General in a Universal Effort of Dual Headed Monster, Drugs and Terror simultaneous eradication

Be successful

Gideon Rodeh

There is no justification losing an Election Campaign Ignominiously instead of emerging Victorious honorably! The Democrats should have mobilized the entire US Media attacking the Republicans for an Exploitation of US Contingency to vote against their own Interests in favor of big Oil Corporations! Such incessant Transmissions would have been a very efficacious Deterrence for most Democratic families to abstain from voting against their own Interests!

Tough time for all, I would say, though I have not heard much from the family. I hear from Janet often, and it is a tough go, but she is surviving. I am bearing up. My work officially ends for the Lewis Trust at the end of this month. Peter, as I anticipated, did not leave a foundation, and had no desire to give from the grave. It will be up to his kids to decide what interests them. From what i have observed thus far, unfortunately, they don't seem very interested in the progressive infrastructure that Peter worked so hard to build in so many ways. The marijuana work will likely continue, but that is still in the works.

Best regards,
Jenny

Four small things:

I'd change "him" to "them" in the first line.

I'm not sure I'd say she's lead the fight on the Charleston loophole, because she really has no power other than to advocate or denounce. Good to be strong in our language but might lose that first line.

And check the NRA piece with Jen. That played strangely in Ohio for us at least initially. I think it should stay in but flag that for her.

Finally, I know we have Erica Garner issues but we don't want to mention Eric at all? I can see her coming after us for leaving him out of the piece.

Here is Larry Kramer today:

Again, thanks to everyone for working on this today. It was very much needed. And one more shoutout to our amazing authors. That post is spreading like wildfire among LGBT folks right now, and I think we've brought many of them back into the fold. Thank you!

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

STATEMENT ON HIV AND AIDS

Yesterday, at Nancy Reagan's funeral, I said something inaccurate when speaking about the Reagans' record on HIV and AIDS. Since then, I've heard from countless people who were devastated by the loss of friends and loved ones, and hurt and disappointed by what I said, and I understand why. I made a mistake, plain and simple.

I want to use this opportunity to talk not only about where we've come from but where we must go in the fight against HIV and AIDS.

To be clear, the Reagans did not start a national conversation about HIV and AIDS. Unfortunately, the opposite was true. That distinction belongs to generations of brave men and women who started not just a conversation but a movement that continues to this day.

The AIDS crisis in America began as a quiet, deadly epidemic. Because of discrimination and disregard, it remained that way for far too long. When many in positions of power turned a blind eye, it was groups like ACT UP, Gay Men's Health Crisis and others that came forward to shatter the silence. They organized and marched, held die-ins on the steps of city halls and vigils in the streets. They fought alongside a few courageous voices in Washington, like U.S. Representative Henry Waxman, who spoke out from the floor of Congress.

Then there were all the people whose names we don't often hear today – the unsung heroes who fought on the frontlines of the crisis, from hospital wards and bedsides, some with their last breath. Slowly, too slowly, ignorance was crowded out by information. People who had once closed their eyes opened their hearts.

If not for those advocates, activists and ordinary, heroic people, we would not be where we are in preventing and treating HIV and AIDS. Their courage – and their refusal to accept silence as the status quo – saved lives.

We've come a long way. But we still have work to do to eradicate this disease for good and to erase the stigma that is an echo of a shameful and painful period in our country's history.

This issue is important to me. At the 1992 Democratic National Convention, when my husband accepted the nomination for president, we marked a break with the past by having two HIV-positive speakers -- the first time that ever happened at a national convention. As First Lady, I brought together world leaders to strategize and coordinate efforts to take on HIV and AIDS around the world. In the Senate, I put forward legislation to expand global AIDS research and assistance and to increase prevention and education. And as Secretary of State, I launched a campaign to usher in an AIDS-free generation through prevention and treatment, targeting the populations at greatest risk of contracting HIV.

The AIDS crisis looks very different today. There are more options for treatment and prevention than ever before. More people with HIV are leading full and happy lives. But HIV and AIDS are still with us. They continue to disproportionately impact communities of color, transgender people, young people and gay and bisexual men. There are still 1.2 million people living with HIV in the United States today, with about 50,000 people newly diagnosed each year. In Sub-Saharan Africa, almost 60 percent of people with HIV are women and girls. Even though the tools exist to end this epidemic once and for all, there are still far too many people dying today. That is absolutely inexcusable.

I believe there's even more we can – and must – do together. For starters, let's continue to increase HIV and AIDS research and invest in the promising innovations that research is producing. Medications like PrEP are proving effective in preventing HIV infection; we should expand access to that drug for everyone, including at-risk populations. We should call on Republican governors to put people's health and well-being ahead of politics and extend Medicaid, which would provide healthcare to those with HIV and AIDS. We should call on states to reform outdated and stigmatizing HIV criminalization laws. We should increase funding for the President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief (PEPFAR). And we should cap out-of-pocket expenses and drug costs, and hold companies like Turing and Valeant accountable when they attempt to gouge patients by jacking up the price of lifesaving medications.

We're still surrounded by memories of loved ones lost and lives cut short. But we're also surrounded by survivors who are fighting harder than ever. We owe it to them and to future generations to continue that fight together. For the first time, an AIDS-free generation is in sight. As president, I promise you that I will not let up until we reach that goal. We will not leave anyone behind.

Since then, I've heard from countless people who were devastated by the loss of friends and loved ones, and hurt and disappointed by what I said, and I understand why. My comment was just wrong.

I want to use this opportunity to talk not only about where we've come from but where we must go in the fight against HIV and AIDS.

To be clear, the Reagans did not start a national conversation about HIV and AIDS. Unfortunately, the opposite was true. That distinction belongs to generations of brave men and women who started not just a conversation but a movement that continues to this day.

The AIDS crisis in America began as a quiet, deadly epidemic. Because of discrimination and disregard, it remained that way for far too long. When many in positions of power turned a blind eye, it was groups like ACT UP, Gay Men's Health Crisis and others that came forward to shatter the silence. They organized and marched, held die-ins on the steps of city halls and vigils in the streets. They fought alongside a few courageous voices in Washington, like U.S. Representative Henry Waxman, who spoke out from the floor of Congress.

Then there were all the people whose names we don't often hear today – the unsung heroes who fought on the frontlines of the crisis, from hospital wards and bedsides, some with their last breath. Slowly, too slowly, ignorance was crowded out by information. People who had once closed their eyes opened their hearts.

If not for those advocates, activists and ordinary, heroic people, we would not be where we are in preventing and treating HIV and AIDS. Their courage – and their refusal to accept silence as the status quo – saved lives.

We've come a long way. But we still have work to do to eradicate this disease for good and to erase the stigma that is an echo of a shameful and painful period in our country's history.

I've been committed to this work for a long time. At the 1992 Democratic National Convention, when my husband accepted the nomination for president, we marked a break with the past by having two HIV-positive speakers -- the first time that ever happened at a national convention. As First Lady, I brought together world leaders to strategize and coordinate efforts to take on HIV and AIDS around the world. In the Senate, I put forward legislation to expand global AIDS research and assistance and to increase prevention and education. And as Secretary of State, I launched a campaign to usher in an AIDS-free generation through prevention and treatment, targeting the populations at greatest risk of contracting HIV.

The AIDS crisis looks very different today. There are more options for treatment and prevention than ever before. More people with HIV are leading full and happy lives. But HIV and AIDS are still with us. They continue to disproportionately impact communities of color, transgender people, young people and gay and bisexual men. There are still 1.2 million people living with HIV in the United States today, with 40,000 people newly diagnosed each year. In Sub-Saharan Africa, more than 60 percent of people with HIV are women and girls. Even though the tools exist to end this epidemic once and for all, there are still far too many people dying today. That is absolutely inexcusable.

I believe there's even more we can – and must – do together. For starters, let's continue to increase HIV and AIDS research and invest in the promising innovations that research is producing. Medications like PrEP are proving effective in preventing HIV infection; we should expand access to that drug for everyone, including at-risk populations. We should call on Republican governors to put people's health and well-being ahead of politics and extend Medicaid, which would provide healthcare to those with HIV and AIDS. We should call on states to reform outdated and stigmatizing HIV criminalization laws. We should increase funding for the President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief (PEPFAR). And we should cap out-of-pocket expenses and drug costs, and hold companies like Turing and Valeant accountable when they attempt to gouge patients by jacking up the price of lifesaving medications.

We're still surrounded by memories of loved ones lost and lives cut short. But we're also surrounded by survivors who are fighting harder than ever. We owe it to them and to future generations to continue that fight together. For the first time, an AIDS-free generation is in sight. As president, I promise you that I will not let up until we reach that goal. We will not leave anyone behind.

Have floated this idea in a couple of places, but putting it on this thread as well--we have two places online that we could respond to in terms of digital organizing perspective. There is an Out for Hillary group with 14k members that I think some kind of extended engagment over this would be helpful--an AMA with Dominic/ Robby/Dennis, a special Note (which is a long form format over Facebook), re-purposing the Medium piece there, etc would go a long way. Our other option is Reddit, which has an extremely vocal core of LGBT members, but I would prioritize this Facebook group, which is the largest LGBT community of Hillary's supporters I know. These are friendlies, they are already carrying water for us making sure the apology is out there, and they firmly sit in groups 1 and 2 that Dom identified.

Whatever we did to send our LGBT talking points to folks has really worked, they are popping up everywhere on the supporter Facebook groups.

I stayed with Chad last night who was receiving lots of angry calls and notes from people that he didn't call her out by name. He wouldn't do that to her and kept stressing she just made a mistake, but suggested we need to do something more today to protect her. She has a great record and we lost a lot of ground messaging-wise.

Hi all,

I wanted to start a new thread to give a brief update about what I'm hearing from folks and get up to speed on how we're thinking of responding in the short and long term. (Sending to a smaller group from yesterday's call but please do loop in others who should be a part of this convo.)

First, as you can imagine, most people are expressing palpable anger and hurt over the comments. I won't belabor the point because I'm sure we all fielded calls, texts, tweets in the last 24 hours over this. But suffice to say, we aren't in a good place with the community right now.

If I had to break things down, I'd put people into three categories: 1) supporters who were horrified at the comment but accept the apology; 2) supporters who are angry and can only be mollified with a longer statement, tv appearance, roundtable, or something else big that shows she "gets it." They will continue to make hay in the meantime; and 3) Bernie folks who are happy to have a new line of attack.

What concerns me is that in that second group are a lot folks from Queer Nation, ACT UP, and other activists who are out, loud, and not afraid of direct action or aggressive confrontation. Given that, I'd love if we could build on yesterday's response -- and quickly. I don't want this to fester.

I assume we're prepping an answer for tomorrow's town hall, but has there been talk in the office of doing more today?

Looking ahead, is it possible to bump up an HIV / AIDS policy rollout? Is there any interest in putting a roundtable conversation or OTR together? (Robbie Kaplan has already volunteered GMHC.)

Would love to know where your heads are at and to be a part of the conversation today about next steps and moving forward.

Thanks,

I attended McCain's event today in Albuquerque, New Mexico. The main highlights were when he discussed the War in Iraq and his schism with Jim Webb over the GI Bill. McCain argues the educational benefits in Webb's bill will hurt retention, citing one study that says it will reduce it by "16 percent." Basically McCain thinks that one enlistment isn't enough for his plans in the Middle East.

Remarks By John McCain On Memorial Day

ARLINGTON, VA -- U.S. Senator John McCain will deliver the following remarks as prepared for delivery at the New Mexico Veterans Memorial in Albuquerque, New Mexico, today at 10:30 a.m. MDT (12:30 p.m. EDT):

Thank you. I'm always grateful for the opportunity, and pleased to be in the company of Americans who have had the burden of serving our country in distant lands, and the honor of having proved your patriotism in difficult circumstances.

I was blessed to have been born into a family who made their living at sea in defense of our security and ideals. My grandfather was a naval aviator; my father a submariner. And it was nearly pre-ordained that I would find a place in my family's profession, and that occupation would one day take me to war. Such was not the case for many of you. Your ambitions might not have led you to war; the honors you sought were not kept hidden on battlefields. Many of you were citizen-soldiers. You answered the call when it came; took up arms for your country's sake; and fought to the limit of your ability because you believed America's security was as much your responsibility as it was the professional soldier's. And when you came home, you built a better a country than the one you inherited. It's a privilege to be in your company.

The sacrifices made by veterans deserve to be memorialized in something more lasting than marble or bronze or in the fleeting effect of a politician's speeches. Your valor and devotion to duty have earned your country's abiding concern for your welfare. And when our government forgets to honor our debts to you, it is a stain upon America's honor. The Walter Reed scandal recalled, I hope, not just government but the public who elected it, to our responsibilities to the men and women who risked life and limb to meet their responsibilities to us. Such a disgrace is unworthy of the greatest nation on earth. As the greatest leaders in our history, George Washington and Abraham Lincoln, instructed us, care for Americans who fought to defend us should rank among the highest of national priorities.

Those who have borne the burden of war for our sake must be treated fairly and expeditiously as they seek compensation for disability or illness. We owe them compassion, knowledge and hands-on care in their transition to civilian life. We owe them training, rehabilitation and education. We owe their families, parents and caregivers our concern and support. They should never be deprived of quality medical care and mental health care coverage for illness or injury incurred as a result of their service to our country.

As President, I will do everything in my power to ensure that those who serve today and those who have served in the past have access to the highest quality health, mental health and rehabilitative care in the world. The disgrace of Walter Reed must not be forgotten. Neither should we accept a situation in which veterans are denied access to care due to great travel distances, backlogs of appointments, and years of pending disability evaluation and claims. I believe we should give veterans the option to use a simple plastic card to receive timely and accessible care at a convenient location through a provider of their choosing. We should no longer tolerate requiring veterans to make an appointment to stand in line to make an appointment to stand in line for substandard care of the injuries you have suffered to keep our country safe. Whatever our commitments to veterans cost, we will keep them, as you have kept every co mmitment to us. The honor of a great nation is at

I also believe we should provide veterans with a substantial increase in educational benefits. I have joined with colleagues to offer legislation that will do just that. The bill we have sponsored would increase monthly education benefits to $1500; eliminate the $1200 enrollment fee; and offer $1000 annually for books and supplies. Importantly, we would allow veterans to transfer those benefits to their spouses or dependent children or use a part of them to pay down existing student loans. We also increase benefits to the Guard and Reserve, and even more generously to those who serve in the Selected Reserve.

I know that my friend and fellow veteran, Senator Jim Webb, an honorable man who takes his responsibility to veterans very seriously, has also offered legislation that would provide more generous benefits. Both Senator Webb and I are united in our deep appreciation for the men and women who risk their lives so that the rest of us may be secure in our freedom. And I take a backseat to no one in my affection, respect and devotion to veterans. I grew up in the Navy; served for twenty-two years as a naval officer; and, like Senator Webb, personally experienced the terrible costs war imposes on the veteran. The friendships I formed in war remain among the closest relationships in my life. The Navy is still the world I know best and love most.

But, as you might know, I am running for the office of Commander-in-Chief. That is the highest privilege in this country, and it imposes the greatest responsibilities. And this is why I am committed to our bill, despite the support Senator Webb's bill has received. It would be easier politically for me to have joined Senator Webb in offering his legislation. More importantly, I feel just as he does, that we owe veterans the respect and generosity of a great nation because no matter how generously we show our gratitude it will never compensate them fully for all the sacrifices they have borne on our behalf.

The most important difference between our two approaches is that Senator Webb offers veterans who served one enlistment the same benefits as those offered veterans who have re-enlisted several times. Our bill has a sliding scale that offers generous benefits to all veterans, but increases those benefits according to the veteran's length of service. It is important to do that because, otherwise, we will encourage more people to leave the military after they have completed one enlistment. At a time when the United States military is fighting in two wars, and as we finally are beginning the long overdue and very urgent necessity of increasing the size of the Army and Marine Corps, one study estimates that Senator Webb's bill will reduce retention rates by 16 percent.

Most worrying to me, is that by hurting retention we will reduce the numbers of men and women who we train to become the backbone of all the services, the noncommissioned officer. In my life, I have learned more from noncommissioned officers I have known and served with than anyone else outside my family. And in combat, no one is more important to their soldiers, sailors, marines, and airmen, and to the officers who command them, than the sergeant and petty officer. They are very hard to replace. Encouraging people to choose to not become noncommissioned officers would hurt the military and our country very badly. As I said, the office of President, which I am seeking, is a great honor, indeed, but it imposes serious responsibilities. How faithfully the President discharges those responsibilities will determine whether he or she deserves the honor. I can only tell you, I intend to deserve the honor if I am fortunate to rece ive it, even if it means I must take politically unpopular positions at times and disagree with people for whom I have the highest respect and affection.

Now, I would like to end by discussing the subject that concerns all of us more than anything else, the war in Iraq. When I was five years old, a car pulled up in front of our house in New London, Connecticut, and a Navy officer rolled down the window, and shouted at my father that the Japanese had bombed Pearl Harbor. My father immediately left for the submarine base where he was stationed. I rarely saw him again for four years. My grandfather, who commanded the fast carrier task force under Admiral Halsey, came home from the war exhausted from the burdens he had borne, and died the next day. In Vietnam, where I formed the closest friendships of my life, some of those friends never came home to the country they loved so well. I detest war. It might not be the worst thing to befall human beings, but it is wretched beyond all description. When nations seek to resolve their differences by force of arms, a million tragedies en sue. The lives of a nation's finest patriots are sacrificed. Innocent people suffer and die. Commerce is disrupted; economies are damaged; strategic interests shielded by years of patient statecraft are endangered as the exigencies of war and diplomacy conflict. Not the valor with which it i00s fought nor the nobility of the cause it serves, can glorify war. Whatever gains are secured, it is loss the veteran remembers most keenly. Only a fool or a fraud sentimentalizes the merciless reality of war. However heady the appeal of a call to arms, however just the cause, we should still shed a tear for all that is lost when war claims its wages from us.

As we meet, in Iraq and Afghanistan, American soldiers, Marines, sailors and airmen are fighting bravely and tenaciously in battles that are as dangerous, difficult and consequential as the great battles of our armed forces' storied past. As we all know, the American people have grown sick and tired of the war in Iraq. I understand that, of course. I, too, have been made sick at heart by the many mistakes made by civilian and military commanders and the terrible price we have paid for them. But we cannot react to those mistakes by embracing a course of action that will be an even greater mistake, a mistake of colossal historical proportions, which will -- and I am sure of this -- seriously endanger the security of the country I have served all my adult life.

We have new commanders in Iraq, and they are following a counterinsurgency strategy that we should have been following from the beginning, which makes the most effective use of our strength and doesn't strengthen the tactics of our enemy. This new battle plan is succeeding where our previous tactics failed. The Government of Iraq and the Iraqi Army are now taking more responsibility for the security of their own country and fighting successfully in Basra, Sadr City and Mosul. We must give General Petraeus and the Americans he has the honor to command adequate time to salvage from the wreckage of our past mistakes a measure of stability for Iraq and the Middle East, and a more secure future for the American people.

To walk away now -- before the Iraqi government can fully protect its people from ruthless enemies -- would strengthen al Qaeda, empower Iran and other hostile powers in the Middle East, unleash a full scale civil war in Iraq that could quite possibly provoke genocide there, and destabilize the entire region as neighboring powers come to the aid of their favored factions. The consequences would threaten us for years, and I am certain would eventually draw us into a wider and more difficult war that would impose even greater sacrifices on us.

Our defeat in Iraq would be catastrophic, not just for Iraq, but for us. I cannot be complicit in it. I will do whatever I can, whether I am effective or not, to help avert it. That is all I can offer my country. It is not much compared to the sacrifices made by Americans who have volunteered to fight this war for us. I know that and am humbled by it. But though my duty is neither dangerous nor onerous, it compels me nonetheless to say to my fellow Americans, as long as we have the opportunity to succeed we must try to succeed. And I firmly believe that, with the continued right course of action, we will succeed.

I have many responsibilities to the American people, and I take them all seriously. But I have one responsibility that outweighs all the others and that is to use whatever talents I possess, and every resource God has granted me to protect the security of this great and good nation from all enemies foreign and domestic. And that I intend to do, even if I must stand athwart popular opinion. I will attempt to convince as many of my countrymen as I can that we must show even greater patience, though our patience is nearly exhausted, and that as long as there is a reasonable prospect for succeeding in this war then we must not choose to lose it. That is how I construe my responsibility to my country. That is how I construed it yesterday. It is how I construe it today. It is how I will construe it tomorrow. I do not know how I could choose any other course.

The war in Iraq has divided the American people, but it has divided no American in our admiration for the men and women who are fighting for us there. It is every veteran's hope that should their children be called upon to answer a call to arms, the battle will be necessary and the field well chosen. But that is not their responsibility. It belongs to the government that called them. As it once was for us, their honor will be in their answer not their summons. Whatever we think about how and why we went to war in Iraq, we are all -- those who supported the decision that placed them in harm's way and those who opposed it -- humbled by and grateful for their example. They now deserve the distinction of the best Americans, and we owe them a debt we can never fully repay. We can only offer the small tribute of our humility and our commitment to do all that we can do, in less trying and costly circumstances, to help ke ep this nation worthy of their sacrifice.

Many of them have served multiple tours in Iraq and Afghanistan. Many have had their tours extended. Many have returned to combat sooner than they had been led to expect. It is a sad and hard thing to ask so much more of Americans who have already given more than their fair share to the defense of our country. Few of them and their families will have received the news about additional and longer deployments without aiming a few appropriate complaints in the general direction of people like me, who helped make the decision to send them there. And then they shouldered a rifle and risked everything -- everything -- to accomplish their mission, to protect another people's freedom and our own country from harm.

It is a privilege beyond measure to live in a country served by them. I have lived a long, eventful and blessed life. I have had the good fortune to know personally a great many brave and selfless patriots who sacrificed and shed blood to defend America. But I have known none braver or better than those who do so today. They are our inspiration, as I suspect all of you were once theirs. And I pray to a loving God that He bless and protect them.

Thank you.

Talked to Susanne Grooms—she's heard absolutely nothing definitive. She believes that Gowdy will put out some kind of "progress report" today, since today marks the first anniversary of the Select Committee's authorization (who knew?). She thinks that either in the report or in his comments, there will be some indication of what he thinks he has in store for us. Gowdy has not requested time on Cummings' calendar for the week of May 18, and the House is out the week of May 25. It is in session all during June, and Susanne thinks it's conceivable they might try to schedule HRC in June. But she thinks he'll try to use the present standoff as a reason why the Committee can't move faster.

Subject:	FW: Speech on Role of Government and Philanthropy in Reducing Poverty and Inequality

Hi John: I'm not sure about your interest in doing speeches, or whether it is untenable given your new role, but I wanted to pass along this invitation given the topic. We are not involved, or affiliated, with either sponsoring entity. I think this came through me because I spoke with other funders about the Washington Center for Equitable Growth and your role. If you want me to decline on your behalf, I can. I just didn't want to reject it outright since it's a topic you care about.

Steve

Dear Mr. Podesta,

On behalf of the Grantmakers Income Security Taskforce (GIST) and Grantmakers for Children Youth & Families (GCYF), I would like to invite you to participate as a guest speaker for the GIST/GCYF 11th Annual Budget and Tax Briefing: The Role of Government and Philanthropy in Reducing Poverty and Inequality and Restoring Social Mobility, scheduled for February 27-28, 2014 in Washington, DC.

Each year, GIST and GCYF cosponsor an Annual Budget and Tax Briefing for our members. Together, our two affinity groups represent nearly 700 national, regional, community, family, private, and corporate philanthropies active in the areas of poverty alleviation, income security, asset development, economic opportunity, and improving the well-being of children, youth, and families. Typically, attendance at our meetings ranges between forty and sixty grantmakers.

This two-day briefing provides funders and philanthropic advisors with a unique opportunity to learn about and discuss how federal and state budget and tax issues impact supports and services for children, youth, and families. It also affords us to learn about and discuss cutting edge and emerging policy issues, demographic trends and political developments. We are hoping that you can join us as a guest speaker for our dinner program on Thursday, February 27 from 5:30-8:00 p.m. (at a downtown Washington DC venue to be determined) to share your thoughts on America's rising inequality, declining mobility and the roles that government and philanthropy can play to address this troubling trend.

At your earliest convenience, please let me know of your availability to participate. Do let me know you have any questions, or would like additional information. We hope you can join us!

Best,

John,

We know you're getting quite a few emails from us lately. Ok, a whole lot of emails.

They usually go like this: "SuperPACs! Rove! Deadlines!"

So let us step back from the rhetoric.

Brad takes pride in fighting for the issues you care about most -- from growing our economy, to protecting our environment, to helping women earn equal pay for equal work.

He wants to keep fighting for Illinois -- for you. But outside groups and right-wing special interests are gearing up to spend an unprecedented amount of money to try and defeat us.

Next week we have a critical FEC fundraising deadline. And so far, we've been neck and neck with Republican Bob Dold every step of the way.

To pull ahead, we must have a strong showing.

John, this is Brad's first reelection campaign. If you're able, please make a donation to help us keep fighting for Illinois.

Subject: [big campaign] NEA President on Debt Ceiling Deal

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE
August 1, 2011

CONTACT: Brenda Álvarez
(202) 822-7823, newsdeadline@nea.org

Debt Ceiling Deal Is Flawed, But US Default Worse

WASHINGTON—Members of Congress will vote soon on a debt ceiling agreement that will reduce the deficit and avoid a national default – a default that would have a devastating effect on millions of Americans, especially children, seniors and working families. The bipartisan agreement was made Sunday night between the White House and Congressional leaders and is set to raise the federal government's debt ceiling while cutting deficits by at least $2.1 trillion over the next ten years.

Dennis Van Roekel, president of the National Education Association, issued the following statement in response to the deal:

"For the last several weeks, everyday Americans watched a reckless game of political brinksmanship that threatened the stability of the United States economy. What finally emerged is a flawed, yet bi-partisan agreement that will allow us to do what should never have been subject to a debate in the first place: pay our bills. In doing so, lawmakers have protected the senior widow barely scraping by and dependent upon her Social Security check and working parents barely able to make ends meet at minimum wage jobs and reliant upon the food stamps they desperately need to ensure their children are fed. These are not rhetorical debates. They are the real, life-and-death consequences if policy makers fail to come together and act in the best interests of the nation.

"Flawed as it may be, we understand that failure to raise the debt ceiling and the resulting default would have been catastrophic. We are pleased that this agreement funds Pell Grants for two years and temporarily protects Medicaid – the sole source of healthcare for one-third of the nation's children--Social Security, and Medicare. That being said, we have very real concerns as the Bipartisan, Bicameral Congressional Committee takes up its work in the fall.

"We urge the lawmakers serving on this Committee not to be shortsighted. Cuts to education, Medicaid, and financial aid are irresponsible and short-sighted; they ignore the well-documented return on investments in education in the form of a more educated workforce earning higher wages and feeding that money back into the economy.

"The fact that the subject of tax fairness has been punted to a bipartisan committee, rather than addressing it now is especially hard to stomach. It's abundantly clear that some lawmakers are committed to maintaining the fundamental economic imbalance that puts the interests of Wall Street over Main Street. That notion is unconscionable to our 3.2 million members and the American people. The fact that the top one percent of earners in America makes one quarter of all the income is not lost on the middle class. The fact that some corporations made billions in profits yet paid no taxes at all last year is beyond offensive. It's offensive to the cafeteria workers, librarians and teachers who got pink slips as state budgets dried up and it's offensive to the students they served who will soon be piling in to overcrowded classrooms, riding longer bus routes to school and will find narrowed curriculums when the school bell rings in a few weeks.

"What working families need most from lawmakers and business alike are stable jobs, quality, affordable healthcare, and a world class system of public education from preK to graduate school.

"The 3.2 million members of the National Education Association will vigorously fight to ensure that the Bipartisan, Bicameral Congressional Committee and the ensuing economic debate address our concerns. Our greatness as a nation in the long term and our recovery in the short term depend upon the same thing: honoring those who have educated, protected, and built the nation's economic strength. Those people are found on Main Street in every community in every state in this land."

I can only imagine how busy you are in all regards.

I attached a PDF letter to this e-mail that may seem ridiculous, but is seriously intended.

Since I imagine that you are justifiably guarded about downloading and opening an attachment from a total stranger, I've included the text of my letter below as well.

Thank you for your time and consideration.

RE: Preliminary Consideration as U.S. Vice Presidential Candidate

Dear Mr. Podesta:

I will try to be brief and to the point. I am sure that Secretary Clinton's campaign is deep into vetting out possible vice presidential candidates for her. The following are reasons why I think I should be considered (in all seriousness, this is not a joke):

-I am a lifelong democrat

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

-I am 38 years old (comparable to Marco Rubio's young age of 44 years old)

-I am a full-time, board-certified physician in private practice (comparable to Ben Carson's history of being a physician). Also, by the very nature of being on staff at an academic institution, you know that I have a clear legal record / history.

-I am an upstanding citizen, in a (first-time) marriage of 9+ years, with two children, who is truly middle class. My wife and I, like much of middle class America, carry student debt secondary to paying our ways through school (my wife has a Masters in Speech-Language Pathology and also works full-time). We have excellent credit and no history of tax delinquency.

-I am a 100% political unknown – I carry no baggage, no special interests – I realize how much attention my lack of a political career would draw (could be much like when Sarah Palin was picked as Jon McCain's running mate). Also think of Dr. Ben Carson's lack of a political career. My argument is that if you are grounded and level-headed, able to understand and process complex situations, and surrounded by superior advisors, proper educated decisions can be made.

-I did have a career in student government politics in high school, undergraduate (where I was president of the entire NYU undergraduate and graduate student body), and medical school

-I am from a state with 20 electoral votes at stake (Pennsylvania)

-My parents are the story of successful immigrants – moved to the U.S from Argentina in the 1960's, the day after they got married, when they were in their 20's, with hardly a penny to their name … and they achieved the American dream – home ownership, successful business (as a physician), 4 kids – all working professionals with a graduate education …..

-The only negative information that could be "dug up" on me is that my wife is estranged from her mother and sister, but not from the rest of her family, including her father and handicapped brother.

I truly feel that I could bring something extra to Secretary Clinton's campaign and be the best running partner. There are many more reasons I would be an ideal vice presidential candidate to her, I simply wanted to use this letter to open a dialogue to see if you would even consider it.

I also attached my professional CV as a starting point in your consideration.

Thank you for your time.

Sincerely,

New TV Ad Warns: Republicans in Congress Are Trying to Get Their Hands on Our Guaranteed Medicare Benefits and Leave Future Retirees at the Mercy of Private Insurance Companies

Ad from Americans United for Change Comes on Heels of Release of Rep. Paul Ryan's Radical, Costly Budget Plan to Give More Tax Breaks to Millionaires While at the Same Time Replacing Medicare With a Voucher System That Leaves Seniors Paying Higher Premiums for Less Care

SEE: Bloomberg: 'Ryan's Budget Proposal Would Aid Insurers, a Top Source of Campaign Cash'

Washington DC – Americans United for Change launched a new TV ad issuing a stark warning to future retirees about the debt-increasing, job-crippling budget plan now on the table from Republicans in Congress that "would essentially end Medicare" and leave seniors at the mercy of the private insurance industry while at the same time hand out billions of dollars in tax breaks for millionaires and big corporations. See script below for the ad entitled "Hands Off Medicare," which features images of a break-in as a metaphor for the health insurance industry's desire to get their hands on our guaranteed Medicare benefits and the GOP's willingness to aid and abet them. View the ad here which airs this week nationally on MSNBC and on cable news stations in the nation's capital: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=SGwVbm2OdqQ

The effort comes on the heels of the release Tuesday of Republican House Budget Committee Chairman Paul Ryan's budget plan that would replace Medicare with a system where seniors receive a voucher to purchase private health insurance, that according to the CBPP, "would fall farther and farther behind health care costs — and purchase less and less coverage — with each passing year." And according to the

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Congressional Budget Office : "Under the proposal, most elderly people would pay more for their health care than they would pay under the current Medicare system."

The Ryan plan doesn't stop there. It calls for steep Medicaid cuts disguised as a block-grant system, which would shift costs to states that are already facing huge budget shortfalls and eliminate coverage for millions of seniors, the poor and the disabled who depend on it for care right now. In fact, 14 million elderly and people with disabilities rely on Medicaid for health coverage and long-term care such as nursing homes.

While Ryan and his Republican colleagues call their plan to deny care to the poor and disabled the 'path to prosperity,' a recent analysis from the Center for American Progress found that block grants would not only be detrimental to the health of millions of Americans but also cost three million jobs. But not everyone is being asked to make sacrifices. According to the Center on Budget and Policy Priorities , the Ryan plan would "produce the largest redistribution of income from the bottom to the top in modern U.S. history, while increasing poverty and inequality more than any measure in recent times and possibly in the nation's history. That's because the Ryan plan would generate at least two-thirds — about $2.9 trillion — of its $4.3 trillion in budget cuts over 10 years from programs for people of modest means, while making permanent all of President Bush's tax cuts for high-income Americans as well as a new estate-tax giveaway in the December 2010 tax package."

Tom McMahon, executive director, Americans United for Change: "There is nothing courageous about Republicans in Congress asking millions of seniors, the less fortunate and the disabled to make more sacrifices and the richest among us to make even less. If Republicans in Congress had their way, there would be no more guaranteed Medicare benefits for seniors, only a guarantee of paying more and more out of pocket for less care after being left to the mercy to the private insurance industry – only a guarantee that America's poor and disabled will live sicker and die younger while millionaires get another tax break they don't need and the nation cannot afford."

And Just to Note …

- Rep. Paul Ryan has received more than $2.1 million in contributions to his campaign and his PAC from health and insurance interests.
- Nearly 90% of Americans want to increase or preserve federal funding for Medicare , and 75% want to preserve or increase funding for Medicaid.
- Most Americans say the best way to reduce the deficit is to raise taxes on millionaires and eliminate giveaways for oil companies.
- Governors in 17 states sent a letter to Congressional leaders opposing the Republican plan to cut Medicaid by turning it into a block-grant program, which they say would "do little to address cost growth while shifting costs to states and threatening program integrity."

SCRIPT	FACTS

ANNCR: This public service announcement is for anyone who will ever be 65 or older. Monday, word leaked of a plot to steal one of your most valuable assets – your Medicare. The thieves have been identified as insurance companies, desperate to get at the Medicare trust fund. CG: Warning! The insurance companies are after your Medicare	"[GOP budget] plan would essentially end Medicare, which now pays most of the health-care bills for 48 million elderly and disabled Americans, as a program that directly pays those bills …The proposal would also convert Medicaid, the health program for the poor, into a series of block grants to give states more flexibility." [emphasis added, Wall Street Journal, 4/4/11] Insurance Companies Stand to Have An Influx of New Customers. Under the Republican budget, when middle-aged Americans hit 65, they would then "choose from an array of private insurance plans when they reach 65 and become eligible, and the government would pay about the first $15,000 in premiums." This would be a huge boon to health insurance companies. [Wall Street Journal, 4/4/11] "…private insurance companies, making lots of money off the voucher business, will cast their eyes on those potential profit centers, aka seniors, still getting government insurance. So traditional Medicare will be in the firing line — and all those assurances about how nobody currently over 55 will be hurt will turn out to be empty." [Paul Krugman, New York Times, 4/5/11]
ANNCR: They are abetted by Republicans whose budget replaces Medicare with a voucher to buy private insurance. CG: Republicans are abetting the crime	"Mr Ryan's plan promises that once you reach 65, you will receive a voucher for an amount that he thinks ought to be enough for individuals to purchase a private health-insurance plan…If that voucher isn't worth enough for some particular senior to buy insurance, and that particular senior isn't wealthy enough to top off the coverage, or is a bit forgetful and neglects to purchase insurance, there's no guarantee that that person will be insured. It's up to you; you carry the risk." [The Economist, 4/5/11] Fred Barnes, Weekly Standard: It's Voucher Time "Most Republicans in Congress favor Medicare vouchers and say so privately." [4/4/11] Why are Republicans so eager to give business to private companies? Since last year, Republicans have collected more than $25 million from the health insurance industry. [Washington Post, 2/6/11]
ANNCR: The same Republicans who refuse to end tax breaks for millionaires want to put you at the mercy of the big insurance companies. CG: Protect your Medicare from Republicans and insurance companies	To rein in the deficit, Republicans could have chosen to end subsidies for oil companies, and stop using taxpayer dollars to support companies that outsource. In fact, the House Republicans voted twice against ending subsidies for oil and gas companies. ["Tax Breaks vs. Budget Cuts ," American Progress, 2/22/11; HJRes44, Vote #153, 3/1/11 ; Thinkprogress.org, 3/1/11 ; HR 1, Vote #109, 2/18/11 ; House Committee on Natural Resources press release, 2/18/11; The State Column, 1/26/11]

Hillary Clinton Outlines Vision for Confronting Campus Sexual Assault During Visit to University of Northern Iowa

Appearing at a “Women for Hillary” event Monday at the University of Northern Iowa, Hillary Clinton outlined her vision for confronting the alarming reality of sexual assault on college campuses in America.

Noting that an estimated one in five women report being sexually assaulted while in college, Clinton said she would build on President Obama's approach to the problem by working to provide comprehensive support to survivors, ensure a fair process for all and increase prevention.

Clinton’s commitment to tackling the crisis of campus sexual assault is a continuation of her lifelong record of fighting for women and girls. As First Lady, she supported the creation of the Department of Justice’s Office on Violence Against Women. And as senator, she co-sponsored the 2005 re-authorization of the Violence Against Women Act and twice introduced legislation to ensure that rape and incest victims had access to emergency contraception in hospital emergency rooms.

Please see the full remarks below:

“Good morning! Good morning, everybody. Wow, thank you so much. I just told Danielle she really nailed that introduction. She said she has been practicing last night and I said there’s no substitute for practicing when you stand up in front of a crowd of people, and I think we should give her another round of applause. She did a great job.

“And I want to thank Amy Freedman who is our field organizer here in Cedar Falls. She is one of the incredible group of people, predominantly but not exclusive young, who are doing our field organizing, who are volunteering full-time, our fellows who are part of this process and I could not be prouder. We have an amazing team across the state who are working every single day, and they just had a training session with the new thirty organizers and a hundred fellows, and we welcome each and everyone of you to be part of this winning campaign so that you can see firsthand what it’s like to try to work in a campaign on behalf of a better future for all of us and I am grateful to Amy and all the hardworking team here in Iowa.

“I want to thank President Ruud for inviting me here. I’m always impressed by what I hear is happening at UNI. I was told about a certain football game as well.

“But there’s a lot more going on in addition to winning at football. I think this university is winning in a lot of ways. And for that I congratulate not only the leadership, but all of you who are part of making a difference here. I just had a chance to visit with a group of students and faculty, the dean, as well as some others from different colleges and universities about the issues of domestic violence and sexual assault on campus. I did that in part because I care deeply about the issue and am rolling out some policies today that I think will help us move this issue forward so that we would have more comprehensive services for survivors. We would have much more emphasis on a fair process and figure out exactly how we’re going to do that. And we would increase prevention efforts. Now part of the reason I wanted to come here and to talk about this is because yesterday we celebrated the 21st anniversary of the Violence Against Women Act. And that was a landmark piece of legislation in our country and, in fact, in the world.

“The person chosen by then-President Clinton… you know you can’t beat that, right…the person chosen to begin to lead the efforts to translate into reality what we meant by trying to prevent violence against women was the former attorney general of Iowa, Bonnie Campbell-- who is here with us. Where's Bonnie? There she is back there, Bonnie Campbell. She was the first person to lead the Violence Against Women Office in the Department of Justice. She has made that her life’s work. She went with me when I went to Beijing in 1995 on behalf of the United States to state what should have been obvious but needed to be said: that human rights are women’s rights and women’s rights are human rights, once and for all.

“And it was great having Bonnie with me because it wasn’t just enough to go and make a speech. That was important. I didn’t realize fully the importance until…I was really nervous, before I did it. There were a lot of people who didn’t want me to go. I thought I should, but still, it wasn’t clear exactly what the outcome would be. So it was important to have with me people like Bonnie who were doing the work that the United States had to lead, to actually translate into positive programs, policies, changes, what we meant we talked about women’s rights and humans rights and, particularly, discourage violence against women.

“So this is a special time and a special place to be talking specifically about an issue that affects one in five women on campus. And it is something deeply important to me to try to work together with everybody to bring about the changes that are necessary in behavior and attitude. To try to confront the continuing challenge of violence against women, and in particular, here on campuses.

“Now I want to be sure that we have a chance to talk further about that but I also want to lay out some of the other elements of my agenda, because I happen to think that we have to get the basic bargain in America working again for everybody. What do I mean by that? Well, it’s pretty simple actually. If you work hard and do your part you should be able to get ahead and stay ahead. That’s how it’s supposed to work in America. That is how it has worked for generations.

“You know my grandfather, my dad’s father, was a factory worker. He went to work every single day of his life in the Scranton Lace Mills-- he worked there for many years. He did it because he had to support his family but he also did it because he believed, as an immigrant to this country, that it would be better for his children, that they would have a better life. That is the essence of the dream of the bargain, right? And it worked.

“He had three sons they all got to go to college. You know, my dad got out of college in the middle of the Depression, he couldn’t find a job, jumped on freight train-- don’t do this, but he did-- took that train to Chicago. He began looking for a job-- he got a job as a salesman, worked at that for a number of years and went into the Navy during World War II. And when he came out, he started a small business. And he worked really hard because it was a small business…but it provided a good, solid middle-class life for my family.

“So here I am, at UNI, running for President in three generations. And I am deeply grateful not only for the hard work and sacrifice of my family, my parents and grandparents, but to this country, because this country held out a promise. It made a bargain with them that was kept. And I want to be the President and make sure to in the eyes of every single person, particularly young people in this country and tell you, honestly and truly, we’re keeping that bargain for you too. And your future deserves to be as good as anybody’s.

“So how do we do that? Well we’ve got to make America work for everybody, for all people and families not for those at the top. And I think we need a President who takes on all the big issues. You know, issues like ISIS, climate change, Syrian refugees-- those issues. And I am both prepared and ready to do that. I’ve negotiated a cease-fire between Israel and Hamas and Gaza. I put together the coalition that came up with the sanctions that brought Iran to the negotiating table. I know what we have to do to protect our country, to protect our security, and to meet the big challenges.

“But I also know this: that a lot of what is affecting people today is what’s going on in their lives. How do they afford college? How do they pay off the debt once they’re out of college? How do they afford childcare if they get that job that they need? How do they get equal pay for equal work if they are a woman in the work force? So I am prepared and ready to take on those big questions that fill the screens and screech at us from the headlines, that must be addressed by American leadership.

“But I’m also ready to take on those issues that keep you up at night. To talk about…that are a source of worry and concern, because I hear about them. I’ve had some amazing experiences in the last months coming back into politics. Traveling around Iowa and elsewhere. People tell me the most personal concerns. They tell me about their friend’s child that they just buried from a heroin overdose. They tell me about their mother, their 58 year-old mother who got addicted to opioids and just died. They tell me about the untreated mental health and the absolute inexplicable decision by your governor to shut down two of your four mental health facilities in Iowa.

“So, those are issues that really, they really grab me. They touch my heart because I know what it’s like to worry. I know what it’s like to be concerned about what’s happening to somebody you care about, somebody you love in your family. A friend. I want to be about the President who’s also trying to figure out how to empower you with more opportunities and more tools and more support to deal with all of those problems as well.

“Now when it comes to how we’re going to keep that basic bargain and fulfill that dream again, first and foremost we’ve gotta get the economy working for everybody. There’s no two ways about it. It’s got to work for everybody, not just those at the top. So much of what we want to do in our country cannot be realized. Now I will tell you without trying to be either partisan or personal: our country does better in the economy when we have a Democrat in the White House.

“I mean, that’s just a fact. It’s an inconvenient fact for the other side, but that’s a fact. Employment, income, the stock market-- it's all better. And I watched, during the eight years of my husband’s presidency, how hard it was to try to undo the effects of trickle-down economics. But by the end of those eight years we had the longest peacetime expansion, twenty-three million new jobs, and incomes rose not only at the top, but in the middle and at the bottom. Everybody was starting to do better and we ended up with a balanced budget and a surplus which would have given us real opportunities in dealing with our long-term challenges.

“Now, I was elected in 2000 to the Senate from New York. I got 55% of the vote, over 3.7 million votes. So I went to the Senate really energized about what we could do to chart a sensible course that would continue our economic upward movement. But I found a very different reception. The new Republican administration…they wanted to undo everything that had been done the last eight years, they wanted to go back to trickle-down economics, to cut taxes on the wealthy, get out of the way of corporations and everything would just be fine. You know how that turned out. You know, shortly after the November 208 election, I got a call from then-President-elect Obama and he said he wanted me to come see him in Chicago, I really had no idea why. It turned out he wanted me to be Secretary of State, but in large measure, he to talk about why he needed me to go out and deal with the incredible problems we were inheriting around the world, while he tried to deal with the extraordinary problems we had inherited right here at home, with the economy in recession.

“Imagine: you’re a newly elected President and you get handed the worst financial crisis since the Great Depression. Now the Republicans want us to have amnesia about why that happened, don’t they? They want us to just forget that it happened on their watch, their policies. Now thanks to the hard work of the American people and the leadership of President Obama, who does not get the credit he deserves for digging us out of that deep ditch… You know we’re out of the ditch, we’re standing. My goodness we were losing over eight hundred thousand jobs per month! We've recovered over twelve million, but we have a ways to go don’t we? Because even though we’re recovering jobs, we haven’t recovered paychecks and income. People back to where they were before this big crash wiped out jobs, wiped out wealth, and decreased incomes.

“So we have to have an economic policy that will reverse this. That’s what I have laid out. I have laid out a specific set of policies that are aimed at raising incomes again. Because I think that is the central defining issue in this campaign. How are we going to raise Americans’ incomes? And how are we going to make sure that the hard work Americans do, the productivity that we have, is going to be rewarded by a share of the profits they helped to make for the corporations and businesses they work for? I am going to do everything I can to incentivize profit sharing. It doesn’t matter to me if you’re in the headquarters or you're on the factory floor. If that company you're working for is turning a profit, you should be rewarded-- and that is going to be one of my key efforts.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“So I’ve been talking about policy that is not always the most exciting kind of campaign rhetoric. But I think it’s important because we need an agenda about what we're fighting for in this campaign. Personalities are important-- I believe that. I’ve been around politics awhile. But you know what I have found is that you got to know what people tell you they are going to do because chances are they will try to do it. And that’s especially important when it comes to women and women’s issues.

“Because what you will find if you listen to the Republicans is they have a very different idea about what to do with the economy. Now clearly they want to go back to trickle-down economics. You’ve got to love them. I mean, I admire their persistence in believing in a failed policy. I suppose there is something that you’ve got to give them credit for there. But honest to goodness, we can’t afford to go through that again. That’s what they are all saying they would do as President. Cut taxes on the wealthy one more time. Get out of the way of corporations, let them pollute, let them exploit, let them take advantage of workers-- and it’ll all turn out okay.

“Now, we know better than that. But it’s also important to listen to them when they talk about women. Because it is clear to me that a lot of what I believe is important for women, for families, and for our economy, is just not on their radar screen at all. So when I talk about strong growth, fair growth and long-term growth, I have a central plank about how we have to make it more available to women to be in the workforce and to afford to be there in order to stay engaged to contribute to their own well-being and that of their family and the economy. Because to me child care is a woman’s issue but its also a economic issue. Because when women are able to participate fully in the workforce, our economy grows. You just can look at the numbers again. Paid family leave is a woman’s issue, but it’s also an economic issue. You shouldn’t have to lose your paycheck or your job when you have a new baby or a family member gets sick. We make it just about as hard as we can imagine for women to be able to balance family and work. Now I know there are men who do it as well, but predominantly it is still women…caring for newborns and babies, caring for relatives, spouses, and parents and others.

“And equal pay, that shouldn’t even be debated, but we’re debating it. You know, I don’t understand why we still debate it.

“So any issue that affects women’s lives and women’s futures, and the future of families and our economy, is an issue I take seriously. And it’s one that I’m campaigning on, and I’m going to continue to speak out about. Raising the minimum wage is a woman’s issue, right? Two thirds of the people being paid minimum wage in America are women. And here’s one of the worst things, and a lot of Americans don’t know about this and I’m trying to talk about it so I can get a real groundswell of support…is when we raise the minimum wage in the Congress, which we will get to – it will be a hard job, but if we can elect some more Democrats for the next election, we will raise the minimum wage and when we raise minimum wages in states and localities, which I also support, do not forget there are people in many places in America today predominantly women who get what is called the tipped minimum wage. Do you know what that is? They can be paid as little as $2.13 an hour.

“Waitressing, bartending, hair salon employees. Because the theory is they will get up to the minimum wage with tips. The reality is, that’s often not the case. That in fact, they might not get those tips, or they have to be harassed on the job to get those tips. Or even worse, their employer pockets those tips. So when we raise the minimum wage, we are going to do away with this incredible injustice of the tipped minimum wage. People are going to all be eligible to earn the same minimum wage.

“So yes, we have to increase economic opportunity and we have to increase support for women doing work at home and work in the job. And that leads to me to something else we have to do and that is confronting the epidemic of sexual assault on college campuses.

“I saw heads nod when I said one in five women report they were sexually assaulted during college. Just look around you. If we were to have one out of every five women stand up, that would be a pretty big crowd.

“Think of the impact on their lives. They’re trying to manage the emotional, physical, sometimes the educational, financial fallout. They miss classes, some drop out, some never finish their education. Thankfully this is an issue that is finally gaining the attention it deserves. But it is not enough to condemn campus sexual assault, we need to end campus sexual assault.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Thanks to the courage and determination of survivors and advocates, America is waking up to this challenge. And on campuses across the country, including very impressively this campus, people are coming together and coming up with solutions. I was really impressed by what I heard has been happening here at U and I since 2000 -- you got the first grant from that office Bonnie Campbell first led all those years ago, to begin having what is and certainly continues to be a very challenging conversation: everybody at the table, listening to people, coming up with a way to approach this problem and try to end it.

"President Obama's administration has worked hard to shine a bright light on campus sexual assault and I intend to keep talking about it and building on that. Here's why: right now in too many places, survivors don't know where to go to go and find help. Some campuses don't even offer support services including counseling and healthcare, so a lot of young women are truly lost and left out. Others present a maze of bureaucracy that forces survivors to navigate that without any real help at one of the most painful times of their lives.

"As President, I'll fight to make sure every campus offers every survivor the support she needs, and we'll make sure that these serves are comprehensive, confidential, and coordinated.

"I want to add, too, that although the survivors of sexual assault are predominantly women, this also happens to men. It happens to the transgender community-- it happens to others as well. So no matter gender, sexual orientation, ethnicity, race-- services have to be there for everyone.

"Now too often the process of addressing sexual assault on campuses is confusing and convoluted. And many who do choose, which is a hard choice I recognize, to report in the criminal justice system fear that their voices will be dismissed instead of heard. We need to ensure a fair process for all involved, whether it's in campus disciplinary proceedings or a criminal justice system. Rape is a crime wherever it happens and schools and schools have an obligation -- I think it's both a legal obligation and a moral obligation -- to protect every student's right to get an education free from discrimination, free from fear, particularly as to one's safety. So reports of sexual assault need to be treated with the seriousness, professionalism, and fairness they deserve.

"Now we have a great resource in our nation's law students who on many campuses can help to navigate this process. There are some successful models of law school clinics across the country where students are already working alongside experienced attorneys. Back when I was in law school I volunteered for the New Haven Legal Services program. It's one of the best things I did in Law School, it's part of what inspired me to go work for the children's defense fund after I graduated. And so I'm looking for good ideas that come from anywhere. I've heard some great ones upstairs. And I want to commend a young men from one of the fraternities here on campus, who has taken on the issue-- the fraternity has taken on the issue of working to try to change attitudes, to educate not only their fraternity members but the broader campus and event beginning to reach out in to the community. And I want to also commend a mentoring program for silence prevention that was originated her on campus.

"There are good smart solutions, we just need more of them. We need to spread them so that people have more access to them. There are the issues of responsibility and respect that start long before students arrive on campus. I don't think it's enough to try and get a better response once an assault has happened. We need to stop sexual assault from happening in the first place and we need strong prevention efforts to change attitudes associated with violence.

"We need to be spreading the ideas and talking to young people -- literally starting in high school -- about issues like consent and bystander prevention. This is a lot bigger than a single conversation at freshman orientation or, as I heard earlier, an online program that everyone has to take that's kind of in isolation. People have to talk about this, they have to listen to each other, they have to try to understand that this is a serious problem that can be solved. This is something that everybody can play a part in addressing. So today I want to send a message to every survivor of sexual assault: don't let anyone silence your voice. You have the right to be heard. You have the right to be believed. And we're with you as you go forward.

"And let's remember sexual assault doesn't just happen on our campuses. it happens in the workplace, it happens in the military. For too many, it happens in homes and in their communities. So we need to take this on as a broader campaign against violence that stalks and afflicts women and girls at home and across the world.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“Now, I’m well aware that when I talk about these issues like paid leave, equal pay for equal work, reproductive rights, sexual assault against people on campus, Republicans often say I’m playing the gender card. Well if supporting women’s health and women’s rights is playing the gender card, deal me in. Because that is exactly where I want to be.

“Now, on Wednesday the Republicans will have another one of their debates. And we can expect to hear more of the same: the top-down out of touch policies that they’ve been hawking for years. They actually seem oblivious or indifferent to how their ideas would hurt people.

“Last time not one of them had a single word to say about how to make college more affordable because I listened. Not a word for equal pay for women or paid family leave or quality affordable pre-schools so our kids can get the best start in life. No real ideas about promoting clean energy or combating climate change No serious plans for how to keep growing the economy or trying to bring down sky-rocketing prescription drug costs. No real solutions for ending the gun violence that plagues our communities. No one saying loudly and clearly that 'black lives matter' and no one defending marriage equality.

“Now I have to confess that it is somewhat entertaining. Their flamboyant frontrunner has grabbed a lot of the attention lately. But if you look at the policies of all of them running, they’re pretty much the same. They’re Trump just without the pizazz and the hair. You’ve heard Mr. Trump insult and demean women. He occasionally throws some heat my way. He recently said I don’t have a clue about women’s health issues. And he’d do a much better job for women that I would, and as I've said, that is a general election debate I’m really looking forward to.

“And I love it when he gets called out for his offensive comments about women. He comes back and he says he loves women. In fact he says, he cherishes women. Well that’s nice. But if it's all the same to you, Mr. Trump, I’d rather you stop cherishing us, and start respecting us instead.

“But don’t get distracted by what he says alone because the other candidates are saying pretty much the same things. Senator Rubio brags about denying victims of rape and incest access to abortion. Governor Bush says $500 million dollars is too much to spend on women’s health. Ben Carson, a medical doctor, when asked if he supports life-of-the-mother exceptions to abortion bans, said “I’m not sure that’s a legitimate argument.”

“And every single one of them wants to defund Planned Parenthood. Well I just wish they’d go meet the mom who caught her breast cancer early because she got screened. Or the teenager who avoided an unattended pregnancy because she had access to birth control. Or, the survivor of sexual assault who turned to Planned Parenthood for emergency contraception and testing and support.

“Now, these views might be acceptable in a Republican primary, but they are dead wrong for 21st century America. And we need to keep making it [inaudible, applause]. I’m not going to let them shame and blame women. I’m not going to keep silent when they say climate change isn’t real or same sex couples are threatening our freedom. Or when they keep going back to trickle down economics no matter what they call it. I’ve been fighting for families and underdogs my entire life

“If you want a president who will tell you everything that’s wrong about America and who’s to blame for it, you’ve got plenty of other choices. But if you want a president who will work her heart out to forge a better, stronger, and fairer country – an America that works for people again – you’re looking at her.

“So, it starts right here in Iowa and I need your help. I’m asking you to get involved in my campaign to organize your neighbors, your classmates, your friend, wherever you have them in the real world and the virtual world.

“Next time someone sends you a text or an invite to play Candy Crush, turn around and ask them if they’re caucusing. And right now you can text JOIN to 47246, 47246, and go to hillaryclinton.com

“I think this campaign is one of the most important that we’ve had in a really long time. I’m not running for my husband’s third term and I’m not running for President Obama’s third term, I'm running for our first term. But I can tell you, I watched what worked, I know how hard it is. Look, if we could snap our fingers and make the changes we think are best for America, we'd be snapping like crazy.

"This is hard work. This takes intensive effort to find common ground, to build those relationships. I did it while I was in the White House, when I was in the Senate, and as Secretary of State. You know, after I worked really hard to try to get healthcare and we got derailed-- I could have given up, but I didn't. So, I said okay, let's at least get healthcare for our children. I worked with Congress members, Senator Kennedy and others, to get the children's health insurance program that insures more than eight million kids to this day.

"And when I was in the Senate I worked across the aisle with anybody who I thought had a good idea. No pride of authorship. I worked actually with one of the fellows who's running for President on the other side. Because we both saw the same problems in our respective state: Lindsey Graham from South Carolina, me from New York. We had National Guard and Reserve members who weren't getting healthcare. So we did bipartisan legislation to make sure those who served our country got the care they deserved.

"And as Secretary of State, the same thing. Reaching out, constantly, looking for ways to find common ground with Republicans. I will go anywhere anytime to speak to anybody about trying to find that common ground. I think that's what you're supposed to do in a democracy. You know, you can move to a different country – there's a couple we can name, there are a couple of big ones and contentious ones out there where you just do what you're told. There's no democracy. There's no seeking consensus, there's no seeking compromise. It's their way, or no way. That's not the way we work in America. It's frustrating, it can sometimes cause you to want to pull your hair out. But overtime we keep making progress together and we produce results if we stick with it.

"I will also stand my ground. And I will stand my ground against those who want to rip out the progress that we have made together over the last years.

"I can't do it without your help. I think we are on the way to the campaign of great significance in laying out an agenda that people can actually believe is possible. And then having an election on that agenda and getting to work every single day to achieve it.

"So, please join me in helping build an America where everyone has a shot in achieving their dreams and living up to their potential. And yes, where a father can say to his daughter, you can be anything you want, even President of the United States – thank you all very much!"

Subject:	Date/Room Change - The Ten-Year Anniversary of the Yean and Bosico Case and Continued Statelessness in the Dominican Republic

You are cordially invited to a discussion on:

The Ten-Year Anniversary of the Yean and Bosico Case and Continued Statelessness in the Dominican Republic

Tuesday, November 17, 2015
10:00 a.m. – 12:00 noon
200 McDonough Hall

Ten years ago, the Inter-American Court of Human Rights first held the Government of the Dominican Republic accountable for violations of the right to nationality in the landmark case of Yean and Bosico, which the UC Berkeley International Human Rights Law Clinic helped litigate. Despite the judgment, statelessness continues to be a major problem that affects the enjoyment of other rights, such as the right to education, as documented in the 2014 Georgetown Law Human Rights Institute report "Left Behind: How Statelessness in the Dominican Republic Limits Children's Access to Education." Moreover, in 2013, Judgment 168-13 issued by the Constitutional Court of the Dominican Republic exacerbated the problem of statelessness by retroactively stripping hundreds of thousands of Dominicans – primarily of Haitian descent – of their nationality.

A panel of experts will take stock of the impact the citizenship and migration policies of the Dominican government have on people's lives and the solutions to resolve issues regarding the right to nationality moving forward. Additionally, the panel discussion will be informed by a recent fact-finding trip by Robert F. Kennedy Human Rights to the Dominican Republic. Santiago A. Canton, Executive Director of RFK Partners for Human Rights at Robert F. Kennedy Human Rights and Adjunct Professor of Law at the Georgetown University Law Center, will provide introductory remarks and lead the panel discussion. Shaw Drake (L'14), who co-authored Left Behind, will return to the law school as a panelist. Coffee and light refreshments will be provided.

The Georgetown University Law Center is located at 600 New Jersey Avenue, NW, in Washington DC.

Subject:	No Ceilings Policy Agenda
Attachments:	2015-1-5 policy agenda cover memo.docx 2015-1-5 policy agenda.docx

Thanks for agreeing to take a look at this. Attached are a background memo and the policy agenda. The current plan is that H, Chelsea and Melinda Gates will launch the data (both the written report and the visualization) together at an event on March 9, and H will speak alone at the UN on March 10 articulating her vision and outlining the policy agenda.

As I mentioned on the phone, we met today to discuss the policy agenda. She and Chelsea were very pleased with the structure and content. The only change that she wants to make is to remove the language on sexual rights so as not to go too far and cause an issue in the post-2015 negotiations.

Two questions for you. First, should she release a written document at all or simply give a speech laying out this agenda? On the one hand, nothing in here departs from her previous positions (other than sexual rights), and the release of her position in written form makes sense as the world marks the 20th anniversary of Beijing and approaches negotiations on the sustainable development goals. On the other hand, since I'm not clear on potential campaign timing, I wanted to raise with you in case the release of this agenda in March causes any concern. And of course some of these issues, in particular abortion and reproductive rights, are always controversial, so I also wanted to flag. Second, do you agree that she should soften the language on sexual rights?

Of course, with your keen eye toward both the domestic and international contexts, any other thoughts you have on this are welcome. Let me know if you'd like to discuss by phone. And I'd love your guidance on me/my role if you are willing to take a minute on that too at some point.

Thanks,
Jen

When I worked with Howard Dean on the 50-state strategy in 2006, we focused a lot of our time and energy building a grassroots base of support for the Democratic Party.

We knew from the start that the only way our party was going to compete was if we got Democrats from all across the country to own a part of it and be invested.

If we're going to undo the damage Governor Christie has done to New Jersey, that's the kind of grassroots network we need to focus on building in our state.

Chip in $5 or more before December 31 to have your name added to a poster in our office and be recognized as a founding member of New Way for New Jersey.

ABC: Two-minute report on HRC taking questions from the media yesterday; Stephanopoulos introduced the segment before passing it on to Cecilia Vega; reported HRC went 28 days without talking to the press; used footage of HRC's press conference yesterday of HRC answering questions about her stance on the Iraq invasion and her use of a private email server; reported that a judge ordered for her emails be released on a rolling basis every two months; used footage of HRC saying she wanted her emails released; reported on HRC's income and lumped it with HRC wanting to represent the middle class; used footage of HRC giving her wealth answer yesterday; reported the campaign is calling this the ramp-up phase; (notably, no mention of Blumenthal or the Foundation).

NBC: Two-minute report on HRC taking questions from the media for the first time in four weeks; segment with Andrea Mitchell; used footage from her stop at an Iowa coffee shop yesterday; Mitchell wondered whether HRC would continue answering questions in Chicago today, including about HRC and WJC earning $30 million since last year while trying to be the champion of the middle class; used footage of HRC answering the wealth question yesterday; reported that Republicans have been asking HRC questions; used footage of Rand Paul asking about Libya; used footage of Chris Christie knocking HRC for using a private email server; used footage of HRC answering the email question yesterday; reported about The New York Times story about Blumenthal; showed HRC's answer about Blumenthal from yesterday; said some of Blumenthal's emails were passed to Chris Stephens; showed Susan Page saying HRC is not living up to the expectation of being the most vetted Presidential candidate ever seen; reported a federal judge ordered the State Department to release HRC's emails on a rolling basis starting as early as tomorrow.

CBS: The State Department is working out a plan to release HRC's emails from her time as Secretary of State, they plan to release the emails on a rolling basis before the 2016 primaries. The report included a clip of HRC speaking yesterday in Iowa stating that she wants the emails released. HRC took multiple questions from the press yesterday, including her voting to invade Iraq and maintaining that she is proud of the work that the Clinton Foundation has done. Republicans are not satisfied with her answer and continued to criticize the donations the Foundation has taken from foreign countries.

WASHINGTON, DC—The Wonk Room has released a new study guide to educate those watching the presidential town hall debate about Sen. John McCain's positions on domestic policy and the errors the McCain-Palin campaign commits in explaining their stance on the issues.

With Belmont University in Nashville, TN as the host of the debate, the guide also includes a fact sheet on how Tennessee has fared under the failed policies of George W. Bush – policies that John McCain and Sarah Palin would continue.

John --

Attached are three documents:

-- A list of African American, Latino and Asian American candidates, broken down by Cabinet/Deputy and Under/Assistant/Deputy Assistant level, plus a list of Native American, Arab/Muslim American and Disabled American candidates. We have much longer lists for most of the groups, and the lists will continue to grow as we reach out further and more openly, but these are the names to date that seem to be coming up as recommended by various sources for senior level jobs. (I have tried to include member of Barack's campaign and Senate policy staff, as well as participants in the Transition project, as appropriate.)

-- While you did not ask for this, I prepared and attached a similar document on women.

-- At the risk of being presumptuous, I also scoped out how the Cabinet-level appointments might be put together, probability-weighting the likelihood of appointing a diverse candidate for each position (given one view of the short list) and coming up with a straw man distribution. (Obviously, multiple permutations of this are possible. This was just one example to show how it might pan out.)

Let me know when you'd like to discuss. I am around this morning until about 11:30.

VA-10 Dems Outperform McCain Field Effort Nationwide

Wow! Thanks to your help, Feder for Congress and the Coordinated Campaign combined for more than 98,000 door-knocks and phone calls in the 10th District in July. According to a recent report in the Politico, the McCain campaign made only 20,000 nationwide during the same time period. Way to go 10th District Dems! We can't let up now though. The same report noted that the GOP was ramping up its efforts for August.

Subject: less prescriptive read out....
Here's a new draft of a less prescriptive read out – the sentence in parenthesis can be cut if needed. Further below is the white house statement. I suggest cutting the sentence on the economy (we can do that on background) so that our statement doesn't look less gracious than theirs.

"President-elect Barack Obama and Mrs. Michelle Obama were very warmly received today at the White House by President George Bush and First Lady Laura Bush. Upon arriving, President-elect Obama and President Bush proceeded to the Oval Office, where they had a productive and friendly meeting that lasted for XX minutes. They had a broad discussion about the importance of working together throughout the transition of government in light of the nation's many critical economic and security challenges. [Specifically, President-elect Obama stressed the need for immediate action on the economy, including the financial crisis facing the auto industry.] President-elect Obama thanked President Bush for his commitment to a smooth transition, and for his and First Lady Laura Bush's gracious hospitality in welcoming the Obama's to the White House."

White House

The President and the President-elect had a long meeting, described by the President as good, constructive, relaxed and friendly. They spoke about both domestic and international issues, though since it was a private meeting the White House will decline to comment on specifics. The President also showed President-elect Obama the living quarters, including the office the President uses, the Lincoln Bedroom, and the rooms for the Obamas' two young daughters. The President enjoyed his visit with the President-elect, and he again pledged a smooth transition to the next administration.

Ahead of this call, I wanted to circulate two options we currently have for language to reflect either a gentle nod to Gillibrand (basically status quo) or a full embrace of Gillibrand:

Neutral/nod to Gilllibrand

> • Zero-tolerance for Military Sexual Assault and Harassment by strengthening protections to ensure that our women and men in uniform can serve without fear of sexual assault or harassment, including by protecting against retaliation for reporting.

Full Gillibrand:

• Zero-tolerance for Military Sexual Assault and Harassment by strengthening protections to ensure that our women and men in uniform can serve without fear of attack. The decision about whether to prosecute serious crimes like sexual assault should be made by independent, trained, and professional military prosecutors, and women and men in uniform should be protected against retaliation for reporting sexual assault or harassment.

Subject:	[big campaign] ICYMI: Pawlenty stimulus hypocrisy

T-paw trying to have it both ways over the weekend -- while the governor bashes the stimulus, his top econ advisor has this to say: "Communities and job-seekers throughout Minnesota are seeing tangible results from this funding."

Does Gov. Pawlenty agree with his top economic advisor that MN residents are seeing "tangible results" from the stimulus?

Pawlenty Smears Stimulus While His Top Economic Adviser Tours Minnesota Touting Its Success

In an interview yesterday with Bloomberg , Gov. Tim Pawlenty (R-MN) gave a blistering speech attacking President Obama, slamming the stimulus and efforts to reform health care. Pawlenty declared it would be "ludicrous" to think that the Recovery Act is "what pivoted" the economy back to stability. He also said any "fair critique" of Democratic health care legislation includes the argument that "death panels" would make life-or-death treatment decisions.

But as Bloomberg later reported , Pawlenty's criticisms of the stimulus are at odds with both economists and the statements of Pawlenty's own economic development director, Dan McElroy. McElroy, Pawlenty's "point man on jobs and economic development," leads the Department of Employment and Economic Development . He recently went on a 10 city road show titled "Advancing Economic Prosperity" touting the benefits of the stimulus. Speaking about the positive effects of the stimulus, McElroy said :

> "Our goal was to put this money to work as quickly as possible. Communities and job-seekers throughout Minnesota are seeing tangible results from this funding."

A longtime adviser to the governor, Pawlenty has praised McElroy as, "one of the smartest , most hard-working change-oriented leaders that has come to state government in modern history." And McElroy isn't the only Pawlenty official heaping praise upon the stimulus. Pawlenty's top financial advisor, Tom Hanson, told Minnesota legislators that stimulus funds used to plug the state's massive budget shortfall would make "all of our lives just a little bit easier." He added, "The federal money will give us the opportunity to accept federal assistance and push it out into our state, to help as many people as possible."

Not only is Pawlenty hitching his wagon to the outrageous "death panel" lie being propagated by Newt Gingrich and Sarah Palin , but he's also joining the long line of hypocritical Republicans who try to score political points by knocking the stimulus while claiming credit for its success at home.

Subject: [big campaign] Is John McCain Against Birth Control?

Also viewable here: http://www.prochoiceamerica.org/elections/election-pr/06062008_mccainbc.html

NARAL Pro-Choice America

OR IMMEDIATE RELEASE June 6, 2008

Is John McCain Against Birth Control?

On historic* Griswold v. Connecticut *anniversary, NARAL Pro-Choice America says McCain's anti-choice record includes opposition to birth control

Washington, DC – On June 7, anti-choice activists around the country will protest the historic Supreme Court ruling that held that the right to privacy includes the right to birth control – showing just how far out of the mainstream their agenda really is. While the majority of Americans support the use of birth control to prevent unintended pregnancy, John McCain has actually voted to block women's access to birth control. Nancy Keenan, president of NARAL Pro-Choice America, said that voters should question the myth of the moderate maverick that the McCain campaign is selling.

"Forty-two years ago, the United State Supreme Court ruled in Griswold v. Connecticut that the right to privacy includes the right to birth control, yet American women are still facing attacks on their freedom and privacy from every level, including the White House," Keenan said. "Many Americans may be unaware that it's not just a fringe group of activists who oppose birth control. Seemingly 'mainstream' anti-choice politicians like John McCain are consistently bowing to the pressure of their far-right base and moving an agenda that is out-of-touch with the American public."

John McCain has, in fact, voted at least 22 times against women's access to family-planning services, including birth control.

"During his twenty-five years in office, Sen. McCain has consistently voted to block low-income women's access to birth control, to deny our teens accurate information about birth control and condoms, to stop measures that would require insurance companies to cover birth control, and to prevent funds to an organization that provides family-planning services – not abortion – for the world's poorest women. Voters need to know that John McCain is not only against abortion, he is against birth control."

On June 7, 1965, by a vote of 7-2, in Griswold v. Connecticut, the Supreme Court struck down a Connecticut law that prohibited the use of contraceptives, holding the statute violated the constitutional right to marital privacy. This decision is cited as fundamental to privacy rights, but today, the right to use birth control is under increasing attack from extreme anti-choice activists and pressure groups. This weekend, the American Life League, an anti-choice, anti-birth control group, is launching "Protest the Pill Day '08: The Pill Kills Babies."

To learn more about John McCain's full anti-choice record, including a section on his votes against access to family-planning services, please visit: http://www.prochoiceamerica.org/assets/files/mccain_fact_sheet.pdf .

Hidden Oppression in Eritrea

By VITTORIO LONGHI
OCT. 3, 2014

In Europe's debate about how to deal with the flow of desperate migrants from Africa, there is an important element missing: the crisis in Eritrea. Every month almost 4,000 Eritreans flee to escape oppression, according to a United Nations special rapporteur.

A visit to Asmara, the Eritrean capital, is revealing. In the cafes you won't hear people talking about the government of President Isaias Afewerki, and in the streets you will never see a march or a demonstration. Any sign of protest is quickly crushed, and opponents of the government face immediate imprisonment and torture, often in underground jails in remote areas. There they are stuffed into metal containers where the heat is unbearable, and given little food or water. The right to trial does not exist, and those convicted have no recourse to appeal.

This oppression is eerily invisible. You won't see police officers along the sunny avenues of Asmara, nor are there soldiers around. But if you have a camera and start taking pictures, people stare and point at you. In this silent, secret system of terror, reminiscent of Soviet communism, every citizen is a potential spy.

The government in Eritrea exercises control also through the "national service," which is compulsory and open-ended for both men and women from the age of 17. It is easy to see why Eritreans will risk dangerous journeys to escape.

On Oct. 3, 2013, 366 young Eritreans drowned off the tiny island of Lampedusa. The night after the shipwreck, I watched the survivors mourn the dead. They were taken to an airport hangar to wander among long rows of dark wooden coffins, and a line of five little white coffins for the children. The weeping sounded like a howl of despair for a generation fated to live in a country where hope for a better future had been banished. It was a cry for help.

As people gathered in the main streets of Asmara after the shipwreck to view photos of the dead, the police arrived to disperse the crowd, but not before making a list of those who attended.

“Nobody will come to save us,” said a 30-year-old teacher I met on my way to Asmara in May, who asked not to be identified. At one time, she said, she worked for European NGOs, but these organizations were expelled by the government in 2006. President Afewerki denies that the country needs any aid or assistance from foreigners.

“Isaias keeps isolating our country so that nobody can see what happens here,” the teacher told me.

State workers earn an average monthly salary of 500 nakfa (about $15 at the black market rate) and represent cheap labor for both the public and private sectors, especially in mining and construction, where Chinese investments are growing. Many Eritreans rely on informal work to feed their families. In Massawa, once a major port on the Red Sea, Awate Tsegay rents his car to foreigners and hopes to earn enough money to cross the border and join his brothers in Sudan. “Military officers ask up to $1,000 per person to hide you in a car so that you can get through safely,” he said.

The government tacitly encourages illegal migration, recently introducing a 2 percent tax on remittances from abroad.

Once in Sudan, Eritreans avoid the police and take any job available, until they can hire a trafficker to take them to Libya or Egypt, where they can attempt the sea crossing to Europe. The desert crossing is perilous, and many refugees fall victim to torture and organ harvesting.

Meanwhile, President Afewerki, who has ruled for 20 years, still plays the role of the victim. He uses the pretext of the border conflict with Ethiopia to justify tight control over his people. European Union diplomats have expressed concern about the systematic violation of human rights. But if Europe were serious about addressing the causes of the exodus from Eritrea, it would put more pressure on Mr. Afewerki to loosen his grip.

Likewise, the international community has done little to resolve the border conflict. Even less has been done to support Eritrean opposition forces, which could challenge the generals and set the country on the path to democratic elections. But the Eritrean opposition is fractured and presents little threat to the Afewerki government.

“The most active democratic groups are based elsewhere, in Sudan or Europe,” says Valentina Fusari, a researcher in Asmara. Smaller ethnic groups of dissidents are in exile and too disorganized to be an option.

At this stage, without a coordinated effort by the opposition, the dictatorship will keep perpetuating terror and forcing its people to choose between the loss of their freedom if they stay, or a potentially deadly journey if they leave.

Peter Mandelson's memo on how Labour's modernisers lost their way – and where they go next Amongst party members, the leadership contest did not produce a landslide for Corbyn. Fewer voted for him than for the others.

The three mainstream candidates between them got 123,769 votes and Corbyn received 121,751 votes.

Only a third of Corbyn's support came from people who had been Labour members before May; in other words, the rest of his supporters are people who got swept up by him rather than by any enthusiasm for Labour as such and in all probability became more emotionally than politically attached to his campaign and what he stood for. They were voting more for an emblem than a leader.

Far from being a tidal wave of new, young idealists, it has also emerged from research that, overall, only 12 per cent of his voters were under 24 years old. The bulk were retreaded Old Labourites who, together with people who voted Green at the election, gave Corbyn his victory.

This does not take away his success but it puts it into perspective and colours its legitimacy.

At the same time we need to acknowledge that those who supported him have invested a lot personally in Corbyn, we are not going to convince them overnight they were wrong and before then they will provide an army to draw on as they become absorbed into constituency parties.

We are in for a long haul during which time the atmosphere in the party will become increasingly acrimonious at branch and constituency levels.

Let's put our dramatic setback in context.

The original New Labour generation owe the younger generation an apology: what we passed on when we left government in 2010 was not fit for purpose.

With hindsight, we can see New Labour's failure: we provided good policies and a strong electoral machine but not organization in the party and not enough renewal of our ideas as circumstances changed.

Progress and Policy Network were originally created to provide a think tank and rallying point for our supporters but Blair did not invest enough in either and Brown shunned them because he always wanted to position himself to the left of New Labour, whatever the issue. He used the unpopularity of Blair's public service reforms, for example, on both left and right of the party, to garner support for himself.

This was the beginning of our “Tory lite” problem – accusing the Labour government of following a quasi-Conservative agenda - which has de-legitimized Labour’s moderates.

From 2005 onwards, malaise set in as Blair wrestled to keep himself in office and Brown did everything he could to get him out. We said at the time that if this conflict continued it would define New Labour’s legacy more than our achievements in government and this is what has happened.

Blair tried to spearhead fresh policy direction for New Labour in his final year, chiefly in respect of public services, but this was ignored by Brown.

We then drifted badly for a year after the non-election in 2007 until the banking and financial crisis kicked in and gave us, perversely, a new lease of life.

When the election came in 2010, we were seen under Brown as a broadly competent government but without adequate explanation of why people should vote Labour again and no forward agenda. Nevertheless we were strong enough to deny the Tories their overall victory.

By 2015, under Miliband, we had still not acquired any coherent forward agenda but nor did we have a leadership the public recognized as ‘big’ figures. They appeared to the public more like special advisers than real politicians.

Our whole profile as a party became desperately weak and narrower in its appeal as we saw at the election this year in the north as well as the south of England, not to mention Scotland.

The door had been shut on New Labour without replacing it with anything strong or coherent. Under Miliband, Labour was anti-austerity but then intermittently tough on the deficit. We were pro-growth but anti-business. We were against inequality but for caps on welfare. We were for immigration but didn’t want people taking ‘our’ jobs. We were internationalist but against foreign intervention. And so the jumble went on.

In choosing Corbyn instead of Miliband, the general public now feel we are just putting two fingers up to them, exchanging one loser for an even worse one. We cannot be elected with Corbyn as leader.

Nobody will replace him, though, until he demonstrates to the party his unelectability at the polls. In this sense, the public will decide Labour’s future and it would be wrong to try and force this issue from within before the public have moved to a clear verdict.

We must be ready when this happens. We can put forward as compelling a critique of Corbynism as we like but unless we have built in the meantime a coherent, modern and inspirational alternative to him - one that manages to tap in to the passions and emotional commitment of the party as well as speak convincingly to the public - the party will not be ready for a replacement.

We also have to go back to basics in the party where many are arguing again that electability spells unacceptable compromise and that relentless oppositionism is preferable – the ‘new politics’ of the street rather than parliament.

We have to re-win the argument from the branches upwards that electability remains the party’s founding purpose from when the trade unions first created the Labour Representation Committee. If we cannot represent people in parliament and government what is the point of the party ? It is as fundamental as that.

Our organizational challenge is to make this argument, create excitement around new policy ideas, ensure it is articulated by a new generation of parliamentary leaders and generate new methods of grassroots activity and excitement across the party. We have to work with others, in a non-sectarian way, both to renew the party's intellectual base and its reach into the public at a local level.

This activity will not be achieved by a single group or structure. It needs to reflect the broad ideological position of people spanning the party's entire centre left mainstream.

Some initiatives will be taken by Labour MPs, others by think tanks, pressure groups, academics and grassroots associations in the party. In time, we need them to converge on a single platform within the party. They must have one defining purpose: to get Labour back into government not at the expense of our ideals and principles but with new thinking and a fresh programme that embodies them in a modern, relevant and credible way.

Whatever the means, we must not meekly accept that Labour should change its job description from party of government to party of protest and give up on building a winning coalition of voters.

The old labels, totems and divisions have no use anymore, they are damaging and counter-productive.

"New Labour", Blairites, Brownites – they are all redundant. They prevent us reaching out in the party and building essential new bridges. If we want people to listen to us, we must no longer look as if we are continuing past fights.

Instead we have to modernize the modernisers' ideas in true revisionist fashion.

We can be very proud of our time in government and our record, and we should certainly keep reminding people of it but not be imprisoned by it. For many of us it is living history but it is history nonetheless.

People will choose to play their part in renewal in different ways, including on and off the frontbench. We must respect that. We must not have truck with a "no compromise with the party" mentality – look what happened the last time that was tried out on the public.

The last five years' intellectual sterility has left Labour floundering before an electorate that wanted to vote against the Tories but did not feel they were being offered a workable alternative.

They are open to new ideas and approaches to building a responsible and inclusive capitalism – in this sense Ed Miliband identified something important – but just because they question aspects of markets does not mean they are in love with the state.

In addition, politics as a whole in Britain and Europe is desperately unattractive. No wonder momentum has been gained by populists and those who advocate a 'new politics'. If we do not catch up with this and present a viable, attractive and exciting alternative we will be buried by it. It may be scant consolation, but we are not alone in our difficulties. In Spain, Podemos run against "the caste".

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In Greece Syriza swept aside a hollowed out Pasok.

Recognising this and understanding the profound changes in identity and culture that have swept through our politics in recent years must be our starting point. Labour, like most mainstream parties across Europe, looks like an analogue entity in a digital age.

Our principal activity now should not be what's going on in the frontbench in parliament or internal opposition to Corbyn – that will take care of itself - but developing the policies and arguments needed to follow him, disseminating these through publications and events. We should contribute robustly to Corbyn's policy review, a new generation with new ideas.

One last point. There will be many local party members, including parliamentary candidates and councillors, who backed the mainstream candidates in the leadership contest and are in despair about what's happened.

They are in the mood to say "we'll come back when the party gets its act together and is serious again". Those people need to be given the chance to come together. Without this, the party in the country will slowly disintegrate as mainstream people withdraw from elected party and local council office. We have to give them hope that there is a way out of our predicament and that Labour does have a future.

Message Meeting: 3/12/08

Research: Stan Greenberg

We're dealing with swing voters—test showed it works, but need to do more on base voters. McCain is using this period to shore up his base.

Need to test the new information on lobbyist, economics, etc.

In focus groups of 18-29 year olds, the lobbyist issue with McCain has permeated more than expected.

McCain attributes: honest, trustworthy, will keep country safe, strong leader. Most of these are hard to move and not predictive of the vote.

Lobbyist attack was one that drove the "won't bring the right kind of change" shift, which moved voters.

Three dynamics that are drivers for our side: people vs. Washington special interests, take care of home vs. being stuck in Iraq, average people/middle class vs. being for big corporate special interests. We have to attack government—People First message only works if you start with changing government as the way to bring change.

How to use Iraq: priorities, endless war, have made us less secure by being stuck on Iraq to the detriment of everything else (can use Fallon, other military experts). NOTE: with what's happening over the next six weeks—Patraeus coming back to Congress, anniversaries, etc.—Iraq may dominate the news.

Media Market test:

McSame was the most effective in moving the vote, ran the ad in Erie with 1200 points and radio and robocalls. Did pre-surveys in Erie and control market (Evansville IN).

Very successful—weighted pre-and post tests in both markets to original weighting of partisan shift. Overall, movement away from McCain against both candidates in the test market, with no movement or negative movement for Democrats in the test market.

Slight shift in negative feelings toward McCain, but more shifts on the attributes: will bring the right kind of change: in PA went from 40 percent well/48 percent not well, to 38 well/57 not well after test. On too close to Bush, went from 42/50 to 55/38(?). On being independent, he still has a positive rating, but moved away from having a majority.

78 percent recalled content of ad.

Messaging:

PB: Very strong frame that's not going to change: John McCain is not going to change.

We know the country's for change, we're for change, and conservatives are not going to bring about the change we need.

Proof points:

- McCain is the same as Bush.
- McCain is his own words: On the economy—completely at odds with the country, doesn't want to change, says we're not in a recession.
- He's been corrupted by Washington:
- Endless War vs. Priorities here.

Also should be making the priorities argument—he's against pork all over America. But there's one place where he's for pork. Can link up the lobbyist/warmonger/misplaced priorities arguments together.

Need to focus on seniors—new comments on privatization, shift health care cuts to "cut Medicare (or Medicare for seniors)" in ads.

Will Robinson:

Ties to lobbyists are strong, but who cares? What do we do to make this something people care about?

Need to lay out a story—McCain is close to a complete image right now, so some of the attacks we launch on him bounce off. We need the stories that show that his relationship with his lobbyists friends made a difference in his story, and then use real people to sell the story as to how McCain's policies will hurt them.

Can we turn the Straight Talk Express into the lobbyist express for ads? (Will be a problem under C-4 issues guidelines, but can talk more about his work for 20 years). Example: the wheels on the bus vs. the lobbyists' on the bus go ring, ring, ring, the money on the bus goes plop, plop, plop…; or do some free media with wrapping a bus to go up and down K Street with lobbyist express to get some press.

Now that he's raising money, can we do more with his fundraisers, having people outside, etc?

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Could we do fake NPR tags: John McCain is brought to you by the insurance industry, etc. etc.
He's still really squishy with his base—how do we mess with him there? Working with hunters' groups, his support from gaming/lottery groups?
Question about Bush: We've already done a good job tagging him with Bush, but we need to tag McCain. Gluing McCain to Bush is easier and we're well on our way, but we need to glue these lobbyists to McCain.
We need to continue to give people NEW information, in a verifiable way, and a way that's not Washington lingo, but with real people.
Surrounded by politics, won't change Bush's Washington

Mark Armour:

Primary goal is to show McCain is not the right kind of change. Same as Bush, same old politics, just the same.
Bad economy, recession, high gas prices, money down the toilet in Iraq. Paint McCain as out of touch on the economy—ties him to Bush, wrong for people,
We need to deauthenticate McCain—let people see how he's the same as Bush before we just assert it.
We need to put McCain into the pocket of big oil now. McCain says special interests don't give him any money, but he's taken big money from big oil. Tie him to industries as gas prices increase.
Iraq priorities attack--

Pacey:

Hot issue right now is the Boeing deal: implied quid pro quo in a way that most outrages people—listening to lobbyists and outsourcing jobs from America. Can be localized: he came to McCain to change things, and he did; he sent XXXX Ohio jobs overseas.
Old argument: talking about him being out-of-touch is different for someone older—becomes a euphemism for old. Should be using that term for economy, Iraq, etc. He's out of touch not just because he's allied with Bush, but because he's just old.
Should be calling him a war president: his answer to everything is go to war. When the call comes in at 3 am, you don't want someone whose first response will be "fuck 'em, bomb 'em." Wants to stay in Iraq forever, bomb Iran, takes his focus away from things like the economy. Happy Warrior.

Bill:

Lobbyist piece is symbolic of everything else: out-of-touch, doing things in the old Washington way, not the kind of change we need, putting things up for sale, lack of sincerity.
We need to get this back to a definition of him personally. Maybe lobbyist piece can be a part of the overarching narrative, particularly since with so many lobbyists, this will be an ongoing narrative.
What's the description of McCain that resonates that most? It's not that he's old and set in his ways, it's that he's old and set in Bush's ways. Incapable of change: stuck in his ways/stuck in the status quo, can't teach an old dog new tricks.
Set in his ways also undercuts the maverick image.

Bush:

Do we use him as a metaphor? Some in meeting were pivoting away from Bush, while the media market test shows that Bush moves voters.
Mistakes in the past were letting Nixon, Reagan go away. We need to make Bush live forever.
Need oppo on Bush and lobbyists. Loeffler is the link—but there are others (Charlie Black).
Have we looked at tying McCain to the Republicans, not just Bush? Pollsters: haven't looked at. Admakers: could be worth doing given the wrong direction numbers and how unpopular the Iraq War is.

Ideas:

If McCain goes to Paris, we could run a web ad in French with subtitles: Merci John McCain…
Get French people to do something outside his events.
Use McCain/Bush hug as an iconic image—works on the spot, could be a billboard, etc.
Targeted Google ads by zip code: McCain opposed this project here, but voted for bridges in Iraq.

Taglines:
Same old politics, same old thing.
Same old economics, Same old McCain
McSame old….

I gave firm rec on Iowa and NH (that she should do them). Cheryl, I left in the calls to AA and Hispanic radio...to answer your question, my view is that calling into radio station is helpful, although not a game changer. The campaigns would be very happy to get the help and it would provide her some good optical cred for paying attention to these communities. It's a way to be present and helpful without traveling. For that reason, I'd keep it on the list but I don't feel strongly. I think the video and letter have much bigger potential to help the campaigns.

My suggestion in the document is to say that the committees are driving these decisions so it's them and not HRC' taking the hit when people are disappointed. I think the committees will WANT to act as filters and I don't see much upside to HRC's political team having to do a bunch of regrets...but curious what others think.

Dear John,

2008 is the year for change. We hear that a lot from the pundits. But it isn't the pundits that have made this a year for change. It's people like you, all across the country that are speaking out and standing up for a better America.

Thanks to your help and a hunger for change, Judy is running incredibly strong. To date, we have already received 1,799 individual donations! Today we're asking you to help us meet an ambitious goal of 2,008 individual donations for Judy by our March 31st fundraising deadline.

Click here to be one of 2,008 strong for Judy

In 2006 we ran the strongest race against Frank Wolf in 24 years. But we didn't cross the 2,000 individual donation threshold until August 10th, less than 3 months from the election. Now, in 2008 we're poised to smash our own record and put Judy on the path to victory.

Individual donors and volunteers are the backbone of our campaign. Frank Wolf has all of the advantages of an incumbent Member of Congress, including hundreds of thousands of dollars from special interest lobbyists and PACs. Yet, thanks to you, Judy has kept pace in fundraising and was ranked by CQ as the 9th best funded challenger in the entire country!

We need fundamental change in Washington. After 27 years, it's safe to say that we're not going to get it from Frank Wolf. One of the country's leading health care experts, Judy Feder is a public servant, scholar and independent advocate for American families. She can win in November and with your help change the Congress and our country. Will you help us get there?

We're only 209 donors short of our goal of 2,008 strong for Judy and for change by March 31. But we've only got 26 days left to get there.

Click here to be one of 2,008 strong for Judy and for change, today!

Your contribution of $250, 100, $50 or whatever you can give really does make a difference.

Thank you for your support,

Luke McFarland

John,

With 37 days before Election Day, every day counts. Today is our last end-of-quarter deadline of the cycle.

I could have never made it this far without you. You're helping us reach more and more voters every single day, and our first TV ad is now airing in markets across New York.

We're close to our goal but I need your help to raise $26,325 by midnight tonight.

You can contribute online at:

This really is a team effort, which is what I love about it. Your contribution fuels our campaign.

Thanks for your kind and generous support.

I'm working on a piece about John Podesta's hiring by the White House. Am reaching out to folks who know John and worked with him, to get their impressions of how he'll do in the job.

Not on the scale of Flint but for sure to be found all across the country. And there is a federal policy to tie to it as well as action steps including big story in CA about use of cap and trade $$ put into a healthy air fund (AB 535). I heard Maya Yoshitani from APEN (see below) talk about it -a fantastic story of climate change, federal-state action, poor communities, jobs. Bet you could find instances in every upcoming state if you wanted to create a "theme" appealing to young people (climate change) and people of color (though there must be white communities affected as well) and anyone who could benefit from potential job creation.

An Open Letter to the American People

This year's presidential election is among the most significant in our nation's history. The country urgently needs a visionary leader who can ensure the future of our traditional strengths in science and technology and who can harness those strengths to address many of our greatest problems: energy, disease, climate change, security, and economic competitiveness. We are convinced that Senator Barack Obama is such a leader, and we urge you to join us in supporting him.

During the administration of George W. Bush, vital parts of our country's scientific enterprise have been damaged by stagnant or declining federal support. The government's scientific advisory process has been distorted by political considerations. As a result, our once dominant position in the scientific world has been shaken and our prosperity has been placed at risk. We have lost time critical for the development of new ways to provide energy, treat disease, reverse climate change, strengthen our security, and improve our economy.

We have watched Senator Obama's approach to these issues with admiration. We especially applaud his emphasis during the campaign on the power of science and technology to enhance our nation's competitiveness. In particular, we support the measures he plans to take – through new initiatives in education and training, expanded research funding, an unbiased process for obtaining scientific advice, and an appropriate balance of basic and applied research – to meet the nation's and the world's most urgent needs.

Senator Obama understands that Presidential leadership and federal investments in science and technology are crucial elements in successful governance of the world's leading country. We hope you will join us as we work together to ensure his election in November.

MTP

Show opens w/ exclusive interview with Collin Powell where he announces support of Iran deal.

When asked to comment on how he handled emails at State, Powell says, “you can read about it in my book.” Then goes on to say that he arrived at the State Dept with a disastrous information system that he had to fix and bring into the 21st Century. On his desk he had two machines – one was a secure state dept machine that handled secure material; the other was a laptop he used for emails that he sent on an unclassified system.

When asked if he thought HRC’s email situation was serious, he says he can’t answer. Two IG’s working on it, FBI working on it. Best not to comment.

Roundtable (Brokaw/Hugh Hewitt/Joy Reid/Kearns Goodwin): Discussion on new NBC/Marist poll on GOP #’s and Trump’s disastrous interview with Hugh Hewitt on foreign policy issues.

Clip from Interview with Richard Trumka:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Trumka is asked what it would take for Labor movement to work hard for HRC and he says it all depends where she comes down on TPP, and that will determine whether people will work hard for her or just vote for her. Trumka also says Joe Biden has been a champion for working people his entire life. Biden and HRC both would be good presidents. (Trumka will be w/ Biden tomorrow).

Next, roundtable discusses new poll #'s.

Chuck says we did Andrea interview in part b/c her polls are tanking. Highlighted new polls.

Moved to inevitability discussion. Brokaw reminds everyone how important organizing is to wining IA, so polls are less significant in caucus states. Says HRC made huge mistakes in Andrea interview, saying he was "stunned" HRC said she wasn't think about her email construct when she entered the State Department. Says that takes away from big argument that she has integrity.

Chucks says we're now moving into an electability problem. New poll shows Biden runs stronger against Trump and Jeb. Kearns Goodwin says hard for HRC to keep saying "in time the email situation will be clear" b/c she's lost time and integrity and says she has to address this issue more aggressively than she already has. DKG also says many are supporting Sanders b/c they want to be part of a "movement" - and they don't feel there is a movement w/ HRC – lack of energy amongst women and girls.

Joy Reid reminds panel Biden doing ok in polls b/c he hasn't been attacked yet by the media the way HRC/other candidates have. Says HRC needs more energy and more excitement among women. Maybe Biden getting in energizes HRC's supporters.

Chuck says as bad as her poll #s are, Republicans would love to have them.

Hewitt says an even bigger problem for HRC moving forward will be Syrian crisis; Chuck says he thinks her separation from POTUS on how she would have handled Assad regime was most overlooked news of Andrea interview.

MIKE HONDA for CONGRESS

Hi John,

Happy Labor Day!

When I was young my parents worked as sharecroppers, picking strawberries to support our family. It was only because of their tremendous efforts that I had the opportunities I did, and since I began serving my community it has been my goal to make sure every child has a fair chance.

So it's incredibly important to me that people who want to raise their families in Silicon Valley don't have to work two to three jobs just to afford it. That's why I've done everything in my power to lower income inequality: from fighting for a higher minimum wage both locally and nationally, to strengthening and increasing Social Security benefits.

Even as we celebrate the work of our predecessors to get us where we are today, I want you to know that I will never stop fighting to ensure that current and future generations who work hard can raise their families with dignity and security.

I hope you're enjoying a safe holiday with your family.

Sincerely,

Mike Honda

I have been very proud of how Jack and Monica are working in this campaign. I am absolutely certain if our message is heard, we will be successful and Jack Hatch will be the next governor.

But winning this race still requires your help. Can you please contribute $10, $25, or $50 to help us get our message out?

This summer, Jack and Monica have traveled to every corner of the state in an impressive effort to take our campaign's message of new leadership and a fresh start directly to Iowans.

On Thursday, Jack will meet Terry Branstad face to face in the Iowa State Fair Debate and give Iowans a look at the stark choice facing voters this fall: continue with the stale, scandal-ridden status quo or make a fresh start. (The debate will be live-streamed at www.iptv.org and will air at 7 p.m. on your local Iowa Public Television station.)

That's where you come in. Jack needs to be on television to make his pitch, and we need your help to put up ads this fall. Will you be a part of the media campaign that brings about #IowasFreshStart?

JOHN MCCAIN, JUST LIKE BUSH, OUT OF TOUCH ON THE ECONOMY

As gas prices hit record highs , John McCain can't remember when he last pumped gas -- or what it cost. Is McCain's disconnect on gas prices the 1992 Bush grocery store scanner moment of 2008?

McCain's comments on gas prices this weekend are just the latest example of how out of touch he is with American families. Like Bush, McCain is closer to special interests than Americans' interests. He has 22 staffers and fundraisers on his campaign who have lobbied for Big Oil, and his economic plan would give $45 billion in tax breaks to the Fortune 200 companies -- and nearly $4 billion to the top 5 gas and oil companies alone.

-McCain is out of touch with American families.

- McCain can't remember the last time he pumped his own gas – or what it cost.

  WISCKOL: When was the last time you pumped your own gas and how much did it cost?

  McCAIN: Oh, I don't remember. Now there's Secret Service protection. But I've done it for many, many years. I don't recall and frankly, I don't see how it matters. I've had hundreds and hundreds of town hall meetings, many as short a time ago as yesterday. I communicate with the people and they communicate with me very effectively.

- In February, Bush "hadn't heard " how much gas cost.

  QUESTION: What's your advice to the average American who is hurting now — facing the prospect of $4 a gallon gasoline, a lot of people facing –

  BUSH: Wait a minute. What did you just say? You're predicting $4 a gallon gas?

  QUESTION: A number of analysts are predicting $4 a gallon gasoline this spring when they reformulate.

  BUSH: That's interesting. I hadn't heard that.

- Gas prices have nearly tripled since Bush took office. Today gas prices in the US hit a record high, with a national average cost of $4.09 a gallon. When Bush took office, gas was $1.46 a gallon .
- McCain, like Bush, offers billions in tax breaks for big oil, but no relief for families. McCain's tax plan gives nearly $4 billion in tax breaks to the top five American oil companies, but gives families very little.
- McCain, like Bush, is surrounded by big oil lobbyists. More than 22 staffers or fundraisers for McCain's campaign have lobbied for Big Oil, and as a group, they have received more than $6.5 million in lobbying contracts, according to the Center for Responsive Politics.

-McCain would take care of CEOs not middle class Americans.

- McCain's economic adviser thinks CEOs are "exploited workers." On Saturday Phil Gramm told the Wall Street Journal that a CEO who retired with a $158 million pay package was "probably the most exploited worker in American history…His severance package should have been billions."
- McCain's economic plan does more for the Fortune 200 than American families. Fortune 200 companies who would get $45 billion in tax cuts under McCain's economic plan according to a new report from the Center for American Progress Action Fund -- enough to lift 9 million Americans from poverty.

Thanks
Dan

Just today, we got another window into what the Republican candidates really believe. Jeb Bush said he’s “not sure we need half a billion dollars for women’s health issues.” He’s got no problem giving away billions to the super-wealthy and powerful corporations, but I guess women’s health just isn’t very important.

Governor Bush, try telling that to the mom who caught her breast cancer early because she was able to get a screening. Was her health not worth the money? Tell it to the teenager who avoided an unwanted pregnancy because she had access to contraception. Tell it to everyone who was protected by an HIV test.

Governor Bush, you say you’re learning to show America “your heart.” Well today you showed America’s women your contempt.

Now, of course, he’s scrambling to clean up the mess. The Bush campaign claims what he meant to say was that we should just defund Planned Parenthood. Maybe someone should clue Jeb in to what Planned Parenthood actually does – it provides vital health care to millions of American women.

I’ve been fighting for women and families my entire adult life, and I’m tired of the double speak. I’m tired of women being shamed and blamed and dismissed. This isn’t complicated: When you attack Planned Parenthood, you attack women’s health. And when you attack women’s health, you attack America’s health.

Dear Foundation Staff:

First, I want to thank all of you for the well wishes for my swift recovery. I am getting better and I am looking forward to being back in the office.

Until I am able to return to the office full-time, the President and I have asked John Podesta to serve as a special advisor to support me and the Foundation staff in our work. He has graciously agreed to be available by phone and email, as well as to be in the office periodically, to help provide leadership. Please seek his guidance and decision-making as necessary to ensure the work of the Foundation continues apace while I am out.

Once I am settled into a routine, I will update you on when I am available to address matters that might be more efficient for me to handle.

Again – thanks for all the good wishes.

WHAT. A WEEK.

FIRST

Republicans threatened to BLOCK anyone President Obama nominates to the Supreme Court.

THEN

The President fought back! He announced plans to fulfill his Constitutional duties and nominate a Justice within weeks.

THANK YOU MR. PRESIDENT!

NOW

Grassroots donors around the country are stepping up BIG TIME. Thousands of you want the President to appoint a Supreme Court Justice who will reverse Citizens United.

John, if we can reach 5O,OOO online donations by next Tuesday -- exactly one year since we launched -- it'll be a

SUMMARY

This American Bar Association teleconference—sponsored by the Behavioral & Neuroscience Law Committee of the ABA Section of Science & Technology Law—updates participants concerning the latest legal, correctional, and social scientific perspectives on the phenomenon of solitary confinement.

• Does it truly constitute “cruel and unusual punishment” to serve one’s time under such conditions?

• How do experts in prison administration view and solve the practical issues involved?

• What is the perspective of the mental health researchers and clinicians who study, evaluate, and treat the inmates in question?

Attend this teleconference to hear the answers to these and other questions from our esteemed panel of experts.

I don't recall any polling to guide us, but I'd be a bit nervous about rushing to say we'd never support such a tax. Bernie I assume DOES support such a tax and it could be fodder for him if we say unequivocally now that we don't support one.
To be clear: it's lethal in the general, so I don't want to support one. But don't want to give bernie contrast right now. So if there's a way to re-state principles and say she'll announce something in the next few weeks, that would be great.

POLITICO PRO

Full coverage of energy policy

Schumer's comments came at an event hosted by Sen. Sheldon Whitehouse (D-R.I.), who recently unveiled a carbon tax proposal at the conservative American Enterprise Institute that would offset the funds raised by cutting corporate taxes and returning rebates to the public.

The New York Democrat hinted at the potential controversy of his carbon-tax prediction by first asking if his remarks the event, which was streamed live online, would be "on the record" for the press.

Schumer also vowed that Democrats would successfully defend President Barack Obama's landmark climate change rules for power plants from GOP attacks, saying, "We will hold that — they'll need 60 votes to change things, and we're not going to let that happen."

Three Democrats considered swing votes on any Republican bid to unravel Obama's climate rules, Sens. Joe Manchin (W.Va.), Heidi Heitkamp (N.D.) and Joe Donnelly (Ind.), face reelection in 2018.

Subject:	Manuel Pastor invites your feedback (again) on framework for state-level progressive governance

Dear John,

As our team returns from site visits in the states of Washington, Texas, North Carolina, Ohio, and Nevada, it is clearer than ever that states have become key testing grounds for progressive policy ideas, framing, and new organizing strategies. What is required to build towards and sustain effective, state-level, progressive governance? What are the characteristics that indicate or nourish progressive governance, and what factors explain and move a state towards achieving it?

We invite you to join us on Thursday, November 5th from 1-3p EST/10a-12p PST for a web-conference by phone with a small set of funders, organizers, and academics who have advised us on this States of Change project. States of Change is not just a reference to the geography but more so to the "state" of change – or the conditions, arenas, and capacities for achieving progressive governance. This will be a follow up to the call we hosted on January 23 and will be the last in our research process before we finalize and publicly release our results.

Since January, we have interviewed over 60 stakeholders in our case study states, refined our preliminary framework based on the field interviews, and updated our quantitative assessment of the states with the most recent data available. At this web-convening, we will report on our findings, discuss ways in which this framework can be useful in the current political moment, and identify potential audiences and users in order to shape plans for the public release.

We hope that you can join us. We value your guidance for the next phase of our work and for what we hope will be the ultimate outcome of this research: a shared platform to facilitate thinking and discussion about long-term investments that can allow for social-justice goals to be achieved at scale.

Please RSVP by October 1st at https://usccollege.qualtrics.com/SE/?SID=SV_0OCrDwiE9G8EeZn . If you have any questions, please contact Lauren Portillo at lportill@usc.edu or (213) 740-3643. While this will be a conference call—the main purpose is to provoke a lively conversation—there will also be a webinar component. Background materials, agenda, and call-in and webinar log-in information will be sent in advance.

Our best,

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

STATEMENT ON HIV AND AIDS

Yesterday, at Nancy Reagan's funeral, I said something inaccurate when speaking about the Reagans' record on HIV and AIDS. Since then, I've heard from countless people who were devastated by the loss of friends and loved ones, and hurt and disappointed by what I said, and I understand why. I made a mistake, plain and simple.

I want to use this opportunity to talk not only about where we've come from but where we must go in the fight against HIV and AIDS.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To be clear, the Reagans did not start a national conversation about HIV and AIDS. Unfortunately, the opposite was true. That distinction belongs to generations of brave men and women who started not just a conversation but a movement that continues to this day.

The AIDS crisis in America began as a quiet, deadly epidemic. Because of discrimination and disregard, it remained that way for far too long. When many in positions of power turned a blind eye, it was groups like ACT UP, Gay Men's Health Crisis and others that came forward to shatter the silence. They organized and marched, held die-ins on the steps of city halls and vigils in the streets. They fought alongside a few courageous voices in Washington, like U.S. Representative Henry Waxman, who spoke out from the floor of Congress.

Then there were all the people whose names we don't often hear today – the unsung heroes who fought on the frontlines of the crisis, from hospital wards and bedsides, some with their last breath. Slowly, too slowly, ignorance was crowded out by information. People who had once closed their eyes opened their hearts.

If not for those advocates, activists and ordinary, heroic people, we would not be where we are in preventing and treating HIV and AIDS. Their courage – and their refusal to accept silence as the status quo – saved lives.

We've come a long way. But we still have work to do to eradicate this disease for good and to erase the stigma that is an echo of a shameful and painful period in our country's history.

This issue is important to me. At the 1992 Democratic National Convention, when my husband accepted the nomination for president, we marked a break with the past by having two HIV-positive speakers -- the first time that ever happened at a national convention. As First Lady, I brought together world leaders to strategize and coordinate efforts to take on HIV and AIDS around the world. In the Senate, I put forward legislation to expand global AIDS research and assistance and to increase prevention and education. And as Secretary of State, I launched a campaign to usher in an AIDS-free generation through prevention and treatment, targeting the populations at greatest risk of contracting HIV.

The AIDS crisis looks very different today. There are more options for treatment and prevention than ever before. More people with HIV are leading full and happy lives. But HIV and AIDS are still with us. They continue to disproportionately impact communities of color, transgender people, young people and gay and bisexual men. There are still 1.2 million people living with HIV in the United States today, with about 50,000 people newly diagnosed each year. In Sub-Saharan Africa, almost 60 percent of people with HIV are women and girls. Even though the tools exist to end this epidemic once and for all, there are still far too many people dying today. That is absolutely inexcusable.

I believe there's even more we can – and must – do together. For starters, let's continue to increase HIV and AIDS research and invest in the promising innovations that research is producing. Medications like PrEP are proving effective in preventing HIV infection; we should expand access to that drug for everyone, including at-risk populations. We should call on Republican governors to put people's health and well-being ahead of politics and extend Medicaid, which would provide healthcare to those with HIV and AIDS. We should call on states to reform outdated and stigmatizing HIV criminalization laws. We should increase funding for the President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief (PEPFAR). And we should cap out-of-pocket expenses and drug costs, and hold companies like Turing and Valeant accountable when they attempt to gouge patients by jacking up the price of lifesaving medications.

We're still surrounded by memories of loved ones lost and lives cut short. But we're also surrounded by survivors who are fighting harder than ever. We owe it to them and to future generations to continue that fight together. For the first time, an AIDS-free generation is in sight. As president, I promise you that I will not let up until we reach that goal. We will not leave anyone behind.

I think we really should do everything we can to get this up today, if at all possible (fingers crossed). Does not seem to be dying down online, either.

At the 1992 Democratic National Convention, when my husband accepted the nomination for president, we marked a break with the past by having two HIV-positive speakers -- the first time that ever happened at a national convention. As First Lady, I brought together world leaders to strategize and coordinate efforts to take on HIV and AIDS around the world. In the Senate, I put forward legislation to expand global AIDS research and assistance and to increase prevention and education. And as Secretary of State, I launched a campaign to usher in an AIDS-free generation through prevention and treatment, targeting the populations at greatest risk of contracting HIV.

But HIV and AIDS are still with us. They continue to disproportionately impact communities of color, transgender people, young people and gay and bisexual men. There are still 1.2 million people living with HIV in the United States today, with 40,000 people newly diagnosed each year. In Sub-Saharan Africa, more than 60 percent of people with HIV are women and girls. Even though the tools exist to end this epidemic once and for all, there are still far too many people dying today. That is absolutely inexcusable.

I believe there's even more we can – and must – do together. For starters, let's continue to increase HIV and AIDS research and invest in the promising innovations that research is producing. Medications like PrEP are proving effective in preventing HIV infection; we should expand access to that drug for everyone, including at-risk populations. We should call on Republican governors to put people's health and well-being ahead of politics and extend Medicaid, which would provide healthcare to those with HIV and AIDS. We should call on states to reform outdated and stigmatizing HIV criminalization laws. We should increase funding for the President's Emergency Plan for AIDS Relief (PEPFAR). And we should cap out-of-pocket expenses and drug costs, and hold companies like Turing and Valeant accountable when they attempt to gouge patients by jacking up the price of lifesaving medications.

We're still surrounded by memories of loved ones lost and lives cut short. But we're also surrounded by survivors who are fighting harder than ever. We owe it to them and to future generations to continue that fight together. For the first time, an AIDS-free generation is in sight. As president, I promise you that I will not let up until we reach that goal. We will not leave anyone behind.

Have floated this idea in a couple of places, but putting it on this thread as well--we have two places online that we could respond to in terms of digital organizing perspective. There is an Out for Hillary group with 14k members that I think some kind of extended engagment over this would be helpful--an AMA with Dominic/ Robby/Dennis, a special Note (which is a long form format over Facebook), re-purposing the Medium piece there, etc would go a long way. Our other option is Reddit, which has an extremely vocal core of LGBT members, but I would prioritize this Facebook group, which is the largest LGBT community of Hillary's supporters I know. These are friendlies, they are already carrying water for us making sure the apology is out there, and they firmly sit in groups 1 and 2 that Dom identified.

Whatever we did to send our LGBT talking points to folks has really worked, they are popping up everywhere on the supporter Facebook groups.

I wanted to start a new thread to give a brief update about what I'm hearing from folks and get up to speed on how we're thinking of responding in the short and long term. (Sending to a smaller group from yesterday's call but please do loop in others who should be a part of this convo.)

First, as you can imagine, most people are expressing palpable anger and hurt over the comments. I won't belabor the point because I'm sure we all fielded calls, texts, tweets in the last 24 hours over this. But suffice to say, we aren't in a good place with the community right now.

If I had to break things down, I'd put people into three categories: 1) supporters who were horrified at the comment but accept the apology; 2) supporters who are angry and can only be mollified with a longer statement, tv appearance, roundtable, or something else big that shows she "gets it." They will continue to make hay in the meantime; and 3) Bernie folks who are happy to have a new line of attack.

What concerns me is that in that second group are a lot folks from Queer Nation, ACT UP, and other activists who are out, loud, and not afraid of direct action or aggressive confrontation. Given that, I'd love if we could build on yesterday's response -- and quickly. I don't want this to fester.

I assume we're prepping an answer for tomorrow's town hall, but has there been talk in the office of doing more today?

Looking ahead, is it possible to bump up an HIV / AIDS policy rollout? Is there any interest in putting a roundtable conversation or OTR together? (Robbie Kaplan has already volunteered GMHC.)

Would love to know where your heads are at and to be a part of the conversation today about next steps and moving forward.

Thanks,

D.

MoveOn Attacks McCain's Lobbyist Connections; Calls For Chief Adviser To Resign

Black Should Be The First To Go Under Campaign's New "Conflict Of Interest Policy"

John McCain's chief adviser, lobbyist Charlie Black, is the subject of a new video released today calling on him to resign. The video comes after revelations of past lobbying ties and conflicts of interest led to the resignation of three McCain staffers and the introduction of a new conflict of interest policy by the campaign.

The video, released by MoveOn.org Political Action and sent to their members today, highlights Black's work on behalf of some of the world's worst dictators.

Charlie Black, one of John McCain's top advisers, was the head of a lobbying firm, BKSH & Associates, that represented brutal dictators like Ferdinand Marcos in the Philippines and Mobutu Sese Seko in Zaire—along with terrorist rebel Jonas Savimbi in Angola. Black also profited off the war in Iraq by representing firms such as Blackwater and Iraqi fraudster Ahmed Chalabi. Working with Chalabi, BKSH helped promote the lie, later repeated by the Bush Administration, that the Hussein regime possessed weapons of mass destruction.

Earlier this week, two of John McCain's senior campaign staff were forced to resign after revelations that their lobbying firm was paid hundreds of thousands of dollars to represent Burma's brutal military dictatorship.

In total, John McCain's campaign is run by over 100 lobbyists representing foreign and corporate interests.

"Charlie Black has helped some of the world's worst dictators get away with murder," said Noah T. Winer of MoveOn. "John McCain must do the right thing, live up to his campaign's new conflict of interest policy, and demand Black's immediate resignation."

The Black, Manafort partners have woven such an intricate web of connections that the strands become entangled at times. Lobbyist Kelly served as finance chairman of the National Democratic Institute, a public-interest organization established by Congress to promote democracy in underdeveloped countries. The institute recently sent observers to try to ensure a fair election in the Philippines. Bruce,

I hope you are recovering well and feeling better. I am not expecting a response from you necessarily but wanted to ensure you were kept in the loop. I have cced John here so he is aware as well.

Chelsea,

I know that you are still dealing with your grandmother's passing and so forgive me for sending this email but due to the time sensitivity here I wanted to be sure you were apprised in real time.

I did a walk through today with CBRE and Cushman Wakefield re: 2nd floor. As you know the 2nd floor is at approximately 25000 rentable square feet is the only option for expansion in this building. They just rented floors 15 + 16. They may have 16000 rentable available on mezzanine level (1st floor) but they have an offer on the table and so that would have to fall through in order for us to have a chance. The second floor is completely gutted, as 18 was and so it would be a build out from scratch. The south side offers some light. The north side is very dark. It has limited views of Statue of Liberty and no real water view. They have someone who has expressed interest in renting part of the 2nd floor and so they would need to know if we are serious by the end of this month. In the meantime, I have asked Genzler to do some test fits for us. I will speak to Bob on his needs since a whole floor only makes sense if we move CGI in and I need to know what the needs for Secretary Clinton would be to ensure we are accounting for that. Obviously we could modify and move people from 18 as needed to accommodate the Secretary's needs and so we can explore modifications for additional executive office space on 18 and/or add executive space in the test fit options for 2 depending upon her preferences. I assume she would prefer the views of 18 to the non-views of 2. I will also incorporate the individuals from Harlem as discussed in the test fits. (Note: I may move a few of those individuals down before any additional space is procured for business reasons and am currently working on whether I can accommodate them within our current space).

Chelsea- please let me know who best person is to discuss your Mom's needs, Huma? We need some basic head counts and preferences in order to do the test fits. Once we have the test fits then we can better visualize what we need, how best to make it work and the basis for how we move forward. I told Cushman that I would get them head counts by COB Monday and asked for test fit options by the end of next week so that is our timeframe. I will share those when they are completed.

According to CBRE, the market value for space here has increased to the $33-34 a square foot but they are hopeful we could sign a deal (if we decide to go this route) at around $30-31 and with similar numbers on the build out for 18 and possibly additional free rent which would be good for CGI's needs. If there is anything anyone disagrees with, additional input or needs more from me please advise. Thanks, Laura

Senators Susan Collins and Scott Brown Feel "Heat," "Pressure" Back Home to Reject the 'Murkowski Big Oil Bailout' Tomorrow

SEE BELOW – All eyes are on Sens. Scott Brown and Susan Collins on the eve of the vote on the 'Murkowski Big Oil Bailout' –* a reckless resolution that would cripple the EPA from enforcing greenhouse gas emission rules under the Clean Air Act, letting big oil among others off the hook for their pollution and recklessness.

As EPA administrator Lisa Jackson warned, the resolution advanced by oil state Senator Lisa Murkowski (R-AK), would "increase America's oil dependence by billions of barrels" and "would take away EPA's ability to protect the health and welfare of Americans from greenhouse gas pollution."

In advance of the vote, this week Americans United for Change launched a TV ad campaign in the nation's capital and in Portland, Maine targeting Sen. Susan Collins , calling for the defeat of the resolution written by and for polluter lobbyists and co-sponsored by Senate Republicans who have taken $20 million in big oil money.

And this morning, AUFC unveiled the latest ad in the series, targeting Senator Scott Brown in Boston – bringing the total advertising effort to $120,000. Click here to view 'ENOUGH' :

Lobbying heats up as Murkowski resolution hits home stretch

06/09/2010
Robin Bravender, E&E reporter

Industry and left-leaning advocacy groups are waging last-minute lobbying efforts as the Senate prepares to vote tomorrow on a measure aimed at blocking federal climate regulations.

A coalition of 24 industry groups sent a letter yesterday to members of the Senate urging them to support a resolution from Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) that would prevent U.S. EPA from regulating greenhouse gases under the Clean Air Act.

The groups include the U.S. Chamber of Commerce, American Petroleum Institute, National Mining Association, National Petrochemical & Refiners Association, National Association of Manufacturers and National Cattlemen's Beef Association, among others.

Meanwhile, a liberal advocacy group is expanding a television campaign targeting Murkowski's supporters to include Massachusetts Sen. Scott Brown, one of the few Republicans who has not yet declared support for the resolution.

Americans United for Change -- a group formed in 2005 by Democratic officials and labor interests -- will launch a $40,000 television ad in Boston tomorrow targeting the Massachusetts senator after hearing that he is "leaning toward supporting it," said Jeremy Funk, the group's spokesman.

The 30-second ad, which features images of oil spewing from BP PLC's Deepwater Horizon rig, accuses Republicans of "working to gut the bipartisan Clean Air Act" and "giving Big Oil a bailout." Worst of all, the ad says, "Senator Brown is considering voting 'yes.'"

Brown and Maine's Olympia Snowe and Susan Collins are the three Republican senators who have not yet publicly staked out a position on the resolution. The remaining 38 GOP senators are co-sponsoring Murkowski's legislation.

Brown's office did not immediately respond to a request for comment.

Americans United for Change is running similar ads in Maine targeting Collins and a national ad running on Washington, D.C., cable channels during the run-up to tomorrow's vote (E&ENews PM, June 7).

Group urges Sen. Brown to oppose climate resolution

By Associated Press | Wednesday, June 9, 2010

http://news.bostonherald.com/news/us_politics/view/20100609group_urges_sen_brown_to_oppose_climate_resolution/srvc=home&position=recent

A liberal group is planning an advertising campaign to convince Sen. Scott Brown to vote against a Senate climate change resolution.

Americans United for Change planned to spend $40,000 on Boston broadcast and cable television stations to convince Brown to oppose the resolution sponsored by Alaska Republican Sen. Lisa Murkowski. It's slated for debate on Thursday.

Brown, a Republican, has voted with Democrats several times since his special election victory in January.

Murkowski's resolution attempts to undo a finding allowing the Environmental Protection Agency to regulate greenhouse gases from automobiles and industrial facilities.

Massachusetts Attorney General Martha Coakley, who lost the election to Brown, is also urging the Senate to reject the amendment.

A Brown spokeswoman said he'd make his position known soon.

Group runs ad urging Sen. Brown to reject climate resolution

Posted by Beth Daley June 9, 2010 12:46 PM

A D.C.-based liberal non-profit will be running TV ads tomorrow urging Sen. Scott Brown to vote no on a Senate resolution designed to prevent the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency from regulating greenhouse gas emissions.

The Senate is schedule to vote tomorrow on the resolution, sponsored by Alaskan Republican Lisa Murkowski, which would show congressional disapproval with the EPA's finding that greenhouse gases are a danger to human health. The EPA is moving forward on the regulations as a backstop in case Congress does not pass meaningful climate legislation in the coming months.

Brown has not signaled which way he'll vote on the resolution. A spokesman said he would be revealing his position soon, but not today. Yes, that means tomorrow, the day of the vote.

The $40,000 spot, paid for by Americans United for Change, taps into the anger over the BP oil spill and says the Murkowski bill will "gut the bipartisan clean air act – giving big oil a bailout."

The resolution is deeply controversial. The White House this week issued a statement saying President Obama would veto it if it came before him.

The resolution, the White House statement said "would undermine the Administration's efforts to reduce the negative impacts of pollution and the risks associated with environmental catastrophes, like the ongoing BP oil spill.

Murkowski said earlier this week that her bill was to prevent harm to the nation's economy.

"Ultimately this resolution is about protecting the economy and preventing agency overreach. It's as simple as that," said Murkowski.

The spot is expected to air on a mix of broadcast and cable TV in Boston. Here it is.

Liberal group targets Sen. Collins on EPA resolution

By Michael O'Brien - 06/08/10 08:01 AM ET

A liberal action group is targeting centrist Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine) on a measure to block the Environmental Protection Agency's (EPA) ability to issue rules on emissions contributing to climate change.

The group Americans United for Change went up on Tuesday with a new ad in Maine, urging Collins to break with fellow Republicans to reject a resolution of disapproval offered by Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) this week to reject EPA rules on emissions.

The group is pouring $40,000 into Portland, Maine, from Tuesday through Thursday with an ad mirroring a national spot airing in Washington. The ad urges Collins to back Democrats' effort to reject the Murkowski resolution, and is based on indications, a group spokesman said, that Collins is inclined to back the legislation.

The ad ties the oil spill in the Gulf of Mexico to the new EPA rules, with a video of a gushing pipeline playing behind other images and narration in the ad.

Ad Aims to Save EPA Clean Air Act Ruling »

June 7, 2010 6:38 AM

BY MICHAEL MCAULIFF

The Senate is set to take up a bipartisan push this week to undo the EPA’s power to regulate emissions from fossil fuels, and reverse the agency’s “endangerment finding” that such greenhouse gas emissions threaten the environment.

Sen. Lisa Murkowski’s resolution — with Democrats Mary Landrieu, Ben Nelson and the embattled Blanche Lincoln on board — would exercise Congress’s right to review such executive branch rulings.

The effort has 41 cosponsors and Murkowski said recently she’ll get an up-or-down vote on Thursday. But starting tomorrow, the the Democratic-affiliated Americans United for Change are hoping to embarrass a few Republicans into shunning the move, which EPA boss Lisa Jackson says would gut the Obama administration’s push for higher fuel efficiency standards under the Clean Air Act, among other things.

So AUC is linking the vote to the Gulf oil disaster in an ad airing in the D.C. cable market until the expected vote.

“What kind of a politician can look at worst oil spill in U.S. history and think, ‘You know, big oil pollution should be regulated less.’ A wildly out-of-touch and irresponsible one,” said AUC’s Jeremy Funk, who notes that oil companies have given more money to the bill’s sponsors. “It’s gut check time for these Senators who need ask themselves: ‘Hasn’t big oil polluted our environment and politics enough?”

Under the deal Murkowski announced for the vote, it cannot be filibustered. If it passes, it seems unlikely to survive in the House, and President Obama would likely veto it if it did.

Liberal group ad links Gulf oil spill with Murkowski climate plan

By Ben Geman - 06/07/10 11:30 AM ET

A liberal advocacy group is tying Sen. Lisa Murkowski’s (R-Alaska) bill to block EPA climate change rules to the Gulf of Mexico oil spill ahead of a pivotal Senate vote on the measure Thursday.
Americans United for Change is launching a three-day TV ad in Washington, D.C., cable markets that combines images of BP’s gushing well with the claim that Republicans are “working to gut the bipartisan Clean Air Act...and give big oil a bailout.”

Murkowski’s plan would overturn EPA’s “endangerment finding” last year that greenhouse gases threaten humans. The finding is the legal precursor to rules that would eventually require facilities including oil refineries and power plants to minimize emissions.

Murkowski argues that EPA regulations will harm the economy and eventually reach small businesses, despite an agency plan to shield small emitters.

But opponents of Murkowski's measure argue that she and the bill's backers are doing the bidding of industry lobbyists bent on warding off any emissions-cutting mandates.

"Tell the Grand Oil Party – oil money has polluted our politics and environment enough," states the ad, which highlights oil industry contributions to Republicans. The labor-backed advocacy group is spending $40,000 on the three-day buy that starts Tuesday, a spokesman said.

Murkowski's resolution cannot be filibustered, but she will still face an uphill fight to reach 51 votes. The measure currently has 41 backers, including three moderate Democrats: Blanche Lincoln (Ark.), Mary Landrieu (La.) and Ben Nelson (Neb.).

Senate might vote this week on climate measure http://content.usatoday.com/communities/greenhouse/post/2010/06/senate-wrangling-on-climate-change-intensifies/1

By Wendy Koch - 6/7/10

The Senate might vote on a climate change measure this week -- but not the comprehensive overhaul that Democrats say is needed in light of the Gulf oil spill.

Sen. Lisa Murkowski, R-Alaska, will push her measure, backed by a few Democrats, to block the Environmental Protection Agency from regulating greenhouse gas emissions, reports The Hill . She argues that Congress should set such standards, not the executive branch.

Murkowski has 41 co-sponsors, according to Roll Call , which says the final vote is expected Thursday evening.

"Such regulation will ultimately endanger job creation, economic growth and America's competitiveness," Murkowski wrote last week in The Hill.

Opponents are mobilizing to defeat the measure. Americans United for Change says it's spending about $40,000 on cable TV ads in the Washington area this week against what it calls Murkowski's "big oil bailout."

Sen. John Kerry, D-Mass., who introduced a broad climate-energy bill in May with Sen. Joe Lieberman, I-Conn., called Murkowski's measure a "distraction."

"If you don't want the EPA to do it, then the Senate needs to provide some adult leadership to pass a comprehensive climate and energy bill instead of keeping our heads in the sand and then tying the hands of the EPA," Kerry told The Hill.

Kerry said Sunday on ABC's "This Week" that the Gulf oil spill shows the need to "put America on the course to true energy independence and self-reliance," reports Roll Call.

President Obama cited the Gulf spill last week in calling for passage of Kerry's bill, which Republicans oppose.

Sen. John Cornyn, R-Texas, also appearing on "This Week," said he's open to parts of it but remains opposed to the entire package as currently written, The Hill reports .

"We need to be very careful here. I think rather than hit a grand-slam home run, I'd like to work with Sen. Kerry and others to try to hit some singles," Cornyn said.

Kerry responded with his own baseball analogy: "Let me tell you, Joe DiMaggio and Ted Williams and Babe Ruth never stepped up to bat in the World Series and said, 'I want to try and hit a single.'"

CLIMATE: EPA chief links Gulf spill to Murkowski/EPA resolution

(E&ENews PM, 06/07/2010)

Robin Bravender, E&E reporter

TV ads

Environmentalists and liberal advocacy groups are also trying to link the Murkowski resolution to the spill that began in April when the BP PLC Deepwater Horizon oil rig exploded off the Louisiana coast, prompting the worst oil spill in U.S. history.

The left-leaning advocacy group Americans United for Change will launch a 30-second television spot tomorrow accusing senators backing Murkowski of promoting more pollution in the wake of the massive Gulf oil spill.

The ad features images of oil spewing from the BP's rig and accuses Murkowski's backers of "working to gut the bipartisan Clean Air Act and give Big Oil a bailout."

The television ad blasts Senate Republicans for their financial ties to large oil companies. "Senate Republicans, who have taken nearly 20 million dollars from Big Oil, think our environment hasn't been polluted enough," the ad says.

The $40,000 ad will air through Thursday on MSNBC, FOX News and CNN in Washington, D.C., said Americans United for Change spokesman Jeremy Funk.

Funk said the group is preparing a separate ad aimed specifically at Sen. Susan Collins (R-Maine), after hearing that she was leaning toward backing Murkowski's measure. Collins is one of the three Republicans who has not signed on as a co-sponsor to the resolution.

A Collins spokeswoman was not immediately available for comment.

Americans United for Change was formed in 2005 by Democratic officials and labor interests and has run campaigns for a number of Democratic initiatives, including health care legislation, financial reform and climate legislation.

GOP Targeted For Ties To Oil

SECTION: IN THEWHITE HOUSE AND AROUND TOWN

Democratic groups, seeking to take advantage of the Gulf oil crisis, are seizing on Big Oil contributions to Republicans in a bid to undercut the GOP's 2010 candidates and legislation that threatens the broad cap and trade energy bill pushed by Sen. John Kerry. The Democratic National Committee and it's House and Senate campaign affiliates are mining Federal Election Commission documents to determine which lawmakers have accepted oil money as they try to link the lawmakers to the BP oil spill and Republican initiatives to limit regulation of oil firms. The pro-Obama Americans United for Change, for example, are tying both of those efforts together this week as they begin an ad campaign starting Tuesday to blast a GOP proposal before the Senate to limit the Environmental Protection Agency's regulation of greenhouse gas emissions. Spokesman Jeremy Funk said the group will spend $40,000 to air a new ad on Washington cable news programs rapping the proposal from Alaska Republican Sen. Lisa Murkowski. Hers is a direct shot at the Kerry legislation which she claimed will cost jobs. She also believes that Congress and not the administration should decide the limits on greenhouse gas emissions. Americans United said, however, that the Murkowski bill would boost pollution and is being supported by lawmakers who've accepted Big Oil contributions. Murkowski has 41 co-sponsors. Said Funk, "It's gut check time for these senators who need to ask themselves: 'Hasn't Big Oil polluted our environment and politics enough?'" -- Bulletin exclusive from U.S. News

SHOWDOWN THIS WEEK ON MURKOWSKI SCHEME.... The fate of climate/energy legislation in the Senate remains entirely unclear, but policymakers hoping to combat global warming have an alternate route.

As we talked about a few weeks ago, though it's not ideal, the Environmental Protection Agency can use the Clean Air Act to regulate carbon emissions. The White House would like to use this for leverage, telling Congress that if lawmakers don't take steps to deal with the problem, the administration will let the EPA use its regulatory authority. It's the White House giving lawmakers a choice: either you act or we will.

Sen. Lisa Murkowski (R-Alaska) wants to create a third option: nobody acts and the problem just gets worse.

Murkowski has already demonstrated that her sympathies rest with oil companies, but her latest gambit is "a rarely-used procedural maneuver that enables Congress to overturn regulations set by the executive branch." In effect, Murkowski wants to block climate legislation on the Hill and prevent the EPA from having the authority to act.

This will come to a head on Thursday.

Murkowski plans to offer a resolution barring the Environmental Protection Agency from regulating carbon emissions. In other words, Murkowski plans to offer a resolution making it less likely we move away from fossil fuels, making it less likely we act to prevent a foreseeable catastrophe (in this case, global warming) from occurring, blocking regulators from doing their jobs, and disrupting one of our best opportunities to prevent climate change rather than scramble to respond after its incalculable effects rip through our atmosphere.

Murkowski says that her effort is much simpler than all that. "My decision to introduce this measure is rooted in a desire to see Congress -- not unelected bureaucrats -- lead the way in addressing climate change," she wrote.

What an odd thing to say. Murkowski doesn't want Congress to lead the way in addressing climate change. She doesn't want anyone addressing climate change. Her defense for this scheme is little more than a pathetic rationalization, intended to persuade people who aren't paying attention.

The Murkowski effort is generating a fair amount of pushback. EPA Administrator Lisa P. Jackson is going after the measure, as are progressive groups like Americans United for Change, which has labeled the proposal the "Murkowski Big Oil Bailout."

We'll see what happens on the Senate floor on Thursday, but keep in mind, the resolution cannot be filibustered -- if it gets 51 votes, it passes. The Alaskan senator would effectively need all of the Senate Republicans -- which may itself be tricky, since Snowe, Collins, and Brown are hesitant -- and 10 Senate Democrats. That may sound like too high a threshold, but Murkowski already has four Dems, and the senators from West Virginia and Virginia have not yet weighed in.

Maine's Two Senators Pressured to Reject Murkowski Resolution

06/09/2010 Reported By: Josie Huang

Maine's Two Senators Pressured to Reject Murkowski	Listen Duration: 4:39

Tomorrow, the U.S. Senate will take up a controversial measure that would restrict the ability of the U.S. Environmental Protection Agency to control the release of greenhouse gases by cars and industry. Maine's two moderate Republican senators are considered swing votes on Alaska Senator Lisa Murkowski's resolution. Both Maine Sens. Susan Collins and Olympia Snowe have been critical of EPA rules and won't say how they will vote, which is unsettling to environmental groups and state officials.

"The Senate should defeat it and act swiftly to lessen the extensive damage caused in the Gulf, to cut our oil dependence and move to a clean energy economy," says Paul Burns, who is with the group Environment Maine. He says the resolution detracts from the climate change legislation currently pending in Congress, including a bill sponsored by Sen. Collins.

"EPA would have to rescind its clean car standards because the resolution would veto EPA's scientific findings that global warming pollutants endanger human health and the environment," Burns says.

A sticking point for Collins does not have to do with car emissions but the way EPA intends to regulate emissions from burning biomass -- which is to say, no differently from other sources of greenhouse gases.

The forest products industry maintains that biomass users should be exempted from EPA rules. They consider biomass combustion carbon-neutral because it releases carbon dioxide into the air, offsetting the CO2 trees sucked in during their growth.

Collins appears to be on the same page. In a statement she says, "While I support regulating greenhouse gas emissions, I have reservations about the sweeping approach EPA is pursuing. For example, for the first time the EPA has classified biomass as not carbon neutral, which could have a negative impact on Maine's forest products industry."?

But Maine Environmental Commissioner David Littell says it's one thing to call biomass harvested from sustainable forests carbon-neutral. But he says not all biomass is the same. "We can't accept the proposition that trees that are harvested and cut down for permanent development ,that never are going to grow back again, is sustainable and carbon-neutral. Obviously those trees are never going to regrow."

Littell has sent a memo to both senators, urging them to reject the Murkowski resolution, which also seeks to undo the EPA's greenhouse gas standards on tailpipes. "This resolution is clearly heavily supported by the petroleum industry and by the coal industry in this country, and it's really about greenhouse gas reduction and whether we're going to clean up our air and clean up the air sources that are upwind of us," Littel says.

Gov. John Baldacci has personally written the senators. David Farmer, a spokesman for the governor, says that passage of the resolution would be a step backward for Maine, which he describes as a national leader on climate change.

"Maine was one of the states that joined Massachusetts in suing the EPA to move forward with the control of greenhouse gases under the Clean Air Act," Farmer says. "Maine is among the 10 states that were part of the regional greenhouse gas initiative, which is one of the first programs in the country to control greenhouse gases."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Collins is not just getting pressure from within Maine. The national advocacy group, Americans United for Change, is also running ads in Maine against the resolution.

The ads specifically target Collins, but spokesman Jeremy Funk says the group would have liked to target Maine Sen. Olympia Snowe as well, whom he says, in recent days, has been rumored to be open to the resolution.

Snowe's office maintains that she is still reviewing the legislation, but points out that the senator is worried about what repercussions the new EPA rules will have for dozens of major employers in Maine.

President Obama has signaled he will veto the Murkowski resolution. But Lisa Pohlmann of the Natural Resources Council of Maine says that this does not give senators a pass to approve the resolution.

"The U.S. is the biggest emitter in the world and we have to be the leaders on taking action by our government," Pohlman says. "We really believe that there's an important window right now for legislation to actually be able to move through the Senate and on thorough Congress, and this is just not the moment to show any weakness, any sense that this is not an important issue."

The Senate is expected to take up the resolution in the morning. The measure needs only 51 votes instead of the typical 60 because it falls under a special Congressional procedure for measures that change agency rules.

Most Important Climate and Energy Vote of Year Tests Senate Direction

by Keith Schneider on 06/08/2010 14:07

Late last year when Senator Lisa Murkowski announced she would vigorously oppose any effort to use the Clean Air Act to regulate carbon emissions, environmental leaders in Washington understood the significance of the Alaska Republican's challenge. A loyal ally of fossil fuel developers, Senator Murkowski attracts more campaign financing from the oil and utility industries than all but two other Senate lawmakers, according to federal election records.

The months-long skirnishing between Senator Murkowski and environmental advocates is now in its final hours, with both sides asserting they will prevail. At stake is a vote in the Senate scheduled for Thursday night on a “resolution of disapproval” introduced by Senator Murkowski last January and meant to disrupt the Obama administration’s pioneering work to respond to climate change by limiting emissions of carbon dioxide and five other greenhouse gases in the U.S.

Though the Murkowski resolution faces an arduous route through a Democratic-controlled Congress and White House, the Thursday vote will be the most important Congressional test yet this year on where the United States is going on climate action and clean energy.

The details of what's been happening look like this: Senator Murkowski's resolution, which has 41 co-sponsors, would overturn the Environmental Protection Agency’s formal scientific finding on December 7, 2009 that carbon dioxide and five other climate-changing pollutants endanger human health and the environment.
The EPA’s “endangerment finding,” introduced at the start of the United Nations climate summit in Copenhagen last year, was saluted by climate activists and government officials around the world. The finding made it legally possible to use the Clean Air Act, the nation’s primary air pollution statute, to set and enforce new manufacturing practices and emissions limits that tamed the U.S. contribution to global climate change.

Moment of Reckoning For Both Sides
The vote couldn't come at a more opportune moment for climate advocates and the fossil fuel industry and should provide a helpful sorting out of the relative political influence of both sides.

The last six months have been a period of dismay for the American climate action community, challenged by the disappointing results in Copenhagen, and fighting back against the furious attack by pundits and lawmakers on the validity of climate science.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The last six weeks have been equally dismal for the oil industry, which has attracted new public scrutiny because of the horrendous oil spill in the Gulf, and the equally destructive environmental consequences of mining and processing oil from Alberta, Canada's tar sands.

If the resolution passes, an event seen as unlikely by Democratic Senate staffers, it would almost certainly have the effect of putting an even deeper trench in the already difficult path that comprehensive climate and energy legislation has in the Senate. Conversely, if the resolution fails by a wide margin, that result would likely build new legislative enthusiasm for a climate and energy bill this year.

Important players from both sides are making their cases. Americans United for Change today began three days of cable TV advertising in Washington, D.C., that explicitly link the BP Gulf disaster to the Murkowski resolution and the assertion that at Republicans are "working to gut the bipartisan Clean Air Act and give big oil a bailout."
Senator Murkowski issued a statement this week that accused critics of the resolution of misrepresenting her intentions. "There has been a great deal of misinformation spread about my effort by groups -- almost all of which are based outside of Alaska -- who want to cut the emissions blamed for climate change no matter what the cost," Murkowski said. Her spokesman, Robert Dillon, said the resolution is not about debating the science behind climate change. Rather, he told the Associated Press, it's about stopping an "out of control" government agency.
Senator Murkowski's conservative supporters contend that using the Clean Air Act to regulate carbon emissions is a regulatory overreach by big government. "Every sector of our economy -- transportation, power generation and manufacturing -- would be subjected to EPA's bureaucratic reach," said Tom Borelli director of the Free Enterprise Project at the National Center for Public Policy Research .

Mark,

First, all the best at tonight's debate. I really wish I could be there.

I wanted to give you a heads up that I'd like to chat with you tomorrow about Monica Medina's involvement in the pre-election transition. Her previous work at Fannie Mae has raised something of a cautionary flag that I'd like to talk through with you.

Safe travels, and we'll catch up tomorrow.

Best,

Rove's Latest Electoral Maps Have Clinton Stronger Than Obama Against McCain

May 19, 2008 1:48 PM

Electoral maps put together by the consulting firm helmed by Karl Rove, and obtained by ABC News, show Sen. Hillary Clinton, D-NY, to be a stronger general election candidate in a hypothetical general election match-up against Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., than Sen. Barack Obama, D-Illinois.

Click HERE to see the maps and charts from Karl Rove & Co., obtained by ABC News.

States are allocated in Rove's exercise based on an average of public polls, which many pollsters would tell you is a rather unscientific way to look at the data.

Still, for political junkies the information is interesting.

In the first map from Karl Rove & Co., McCain leads Obama in a hypothetical match-up, winning states totaling 238 electoral votes to Obama's 221 electoral votes.

There are 538 total electoral votes. At least 270 are needed to win the presidency.

The trend is positive for Obama -- he is up 14 electoral votes from May 11, and McCain is down 13 electoral votes.

The map shows McCain winning Florida, New Hampshire, West Virginia and Wisconsin. States with 79 electoral votes -- Connecticut, Colorado, Iowa, Michigan, Nebraska, New Mexico, North Dakota, Ohio, and Virginia -- are toss-ups, within a margin of error of +/- 3 points.

In the hypothetical Clinton-McCain match-up, Clinton leads with 259 electoral votes to McCain's 206 electoral votes.

States totaling 73 electoral votes -- Connecticut, Iowa, Michigan, Minnesota, Missouri, and New Mexico -- too close to call.

Clinton, too, is trending upwards, with a gain of 11 electoral votes since May 11.

The big differences between Clinton and Obama, beyond the her larger number:

Clinton would make competitive some states that Obama would lose -- such as Missouri and New Hampshire -- and she would win others outright, such as Arkansas, Florida, Ohio and West Virginia.

On the other hand, McCain would handily win beat Clinton in some states that Obama made competitive, such as Colorado, North Dakota, and Virginia. Some states that Obama would win, such as Minnesota and Nebraska -- Clinton would lose to McCain.

Occasionally this election cycle the electoral maps of Karl Rove & Co. have reared their heads. In March, McCain adviser Mark McKinnon was spotted holding some of these maps, as reported by Texas Monthly .

Made some fixes to the VP team. Here's the latest version of the release. We're still waiting to see if we have www.change.gov. Will know that by noon.

President-elect Barack Obama and Vice President-elect Joe Biden today announce the leadership team for the presidential transition.

For the past several months, a board of advisors has been informally helping Barack Obama and Joe Biden plan for a possible presidential transition. Among the many projects undertaken by the transition board have been detailed analyses of previous transition efforts, policy statements made during the campaign, and the workings of different government offices and positions.

After last night's election, this planning process will be now being formally organized as the Obama-Biden Transition Project, a 501(c)(4) organization to ensure a smooth transition from one administration to the next. The work of this entity will be overseen by three co-chairs: John Podesta, Valerie Jarrett, and Pete Rouse. The Vice President-elect's co-chairs are Mark Gitenstein and Ted Kaufman.

The co-chairs will be assisted by an advisory board comprised of individuals with significant private and public sector experience: Carol Browner, Bill Daley, Chris Edley, Michael Froman, Julius Genachowski, Don Gips, Governor Janet Napolitano, Federico Pena, Susan Rice, and Sonal Shaw.

Supervising the day-to-day activities of the transition will be a transition team headquartered in Washington, DC, with an additional office in Chicago, IL.

Supervising the day-to-day activities of the transition will be the following individuals:

Transition Senior Staff:
Chris Lu – Executive Director
Dan Pfeiffer – Communications Director
Stephanie Cutter – Chief Spokesperson
Cassandra Butts – General Counsel

Melody Barnes – Co-Director of Agency Review
Lisa Brown – Co-Director of Agency Review
Jim Messina – Personnel Director
Patrick Gaspard – Associate Personnel Director
Michael Strautmanis – Director of Public Liaison and Intergovernmental Affairs
Phil Schiliro – Director of Congressional Relations
Katy Kale – Director of Operations
Brad Kiley – Director of Operations

Additional members of the transition leadership team will be named in the coming days.

The phone number for the transition headquarters is 202-540-3000. The official website for the transition is www.change.gov.

Good evening
This afternoon the AFL-CIO convened the Political Committee (usually chaired by AFSCME President Lee Saunders but because of a health issue, Trumka chaired). Interesting intel from this meeting to pass along.

Political Committee Discussion Points today:

1. Stuart Appelbaum pushed back on the AFT at the meeting regarding their early endorsement process. He stated that he understood there to be a 60 day notification to affiliated unions by an endorsing union. Trumka clarified that that was incorrect. He engaged in debate with Randi Weingarten's Executive Assistant Michelle Ringuette about their process and Trumka cut off debate. Appelbaum also urged no early endorsement by the AFL-CIO in the Presidential primary.

Randi personally called today to mention this exchange with Stuart along with the importance of prep for the Executive Council meeting and reconnecting on policy. She stated that she will be directly following up with Appelbaum and was very shocked by his comments at the meeting. Randi is in Canada or would have been there in person.

I am attaching a letter from Lee Saunders in the response to attacks Randi has received over the past week, FYI.

2. The Political Committee decided that there would not be a President endorsement recommendation coming off of the Executive Committee meeting by July 30th. This is not news for us but it was formally voted on. This still allows them to move in the future, internally I have heard a lot of talk that they know they need to endorse and would be looking to before February 2016 (how it looks today, we'll see).

3. The Bricklayer Unions (HRC spoke with President Boland on 6/10/15 and he also attended the Podesta's reception) announced that they will be making a endorsement recommendation at their Convention on 9/14-17/15. I will follow up with them tomorrow, but this is good news for us. BAC was a 2007 HRC endorsers.

4. Write off APWU and the Flight Attendants (affiliated with CWA)-Both Presidents publicly stated their support for Sanders in the Political Committee meeting today. I think our work is to keep them neutral.

Preparation for the Executive Council Meeting:

Randi mentioned today she very much wants to be on the offense going into the July 30th Executive Council meeting. She is going to be asking for a point of privilege at the meeting to emphasize the importance of her early endorsement. She has already lined support in the room among AFSCME, Trade Unions and IAM. She wants HRC to go into the room on offense too. I flag this because I think it could be helpful to have a strategy session around the July 30th meeting for the Secretary. Randi also raised the Cadillac Tax issue with me today. Randi is really an amazing HRC champion.

Other Follow Up Items:

AFT will be in the HQ tomorrow in department meetings from 11-4pm.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

*Flag for you, UTU President Mike Mulgrew will be attending the Policy meeting from 1-2pm. This was at the request of Randi.

We will be meeting in the Nevada room if anyone would like to stop by.

I am reviewing tonight/tomorrow the research on ATU/APWU/CWA and will circle back.

I am setting up meetings with Suzie Ballentine this week and have a meeting with Heather and Erin next week. I'm going to only be asking Suzie for her insights on the CWA and ATU, but not asking for assistance beyond her thoughts. FYI.

Thank you! September 9th is locked in for the Building Trades Council Meeting. Great news.

Dear John,

Below is our "Willy Wonka Golden Ticket" … our "Democratic Scorecard" … our "key to victory"! It's been called "brilliant" - DemConWatch.

Democrats have been taken with its simplicity; the reality of its truth!

Arlen Specter campaigns - we kid you not - that he's "a JFK Democrat, who's voted more times with Democrats than with Republicans over my career." [Reality: Arlen voted just 23% with Democrats during the Bush administration, and 85% of the time with the GOP during other administrations.]

As the late, great Democratic Senator Daniel Patrick Moynihan (D-NY) said when responding to a similar "challenged Republican" ... "You sir, are entitled to your own opinion, but not to your own facts."

As we've been handing out the "Democratic Scorecard" over the past few weeks, Democrats have been stunned; stopped in their tracks by the "Democratic Scorecard's" simplicity and honest truth … followed a few seconds later with the recipient saying ... "Joe Sestak … he's got my vote!"

As we enter the final phases of "Operation True Democrat", our army of volunteers will be fanning out across the state over the next 18 days distributing the "Willy Wonka Golden Tickets" to Democrats.

We are asking you to please help us deliver the "Willy Wonka Golden Ticket" to Democrats, and ensure we'll have a continual supply, by making a contribution of $15, $25, $50, $100, whatever you are able to afford - this really is the Golden Ticket!

The original movie "Willy Wonka and the Chocolate Factory" starring Gene Wilder was released in 1971 (the same year Arlen Specter was supporting Richard Nixon) and the re-make "Charlie and the Chocolate Factory" was released in 2005, staring Johnny Depp (the same year the Arlen Specter was supporting George W. Bush). "The "Golden Ticket" was a winning ticket to Willie Wonka's chocolate factory. This primary season, the "Golden Ticket" is the winning ticket to electing the true, and only, Democrat in the race - - Joe Sestak! Help us distribute this "Golden, Winning Ticket" to Democrats throughout Pennsylvania by making a donation today!

Subject:	Anna Burger Job at State Special Representative on Labor

John---I understand that the decision on this job is pending, and that Anna may not be the top choice of the State Department.

No one is more qualified than Anna for this job, and I am very disappointed if this is true.

From the moment the President chose to run for office, and all through the primary, SEIU was more than supportive. SEIU made huge contributions both in terms of resources and volunteers to his election and his reelection campaign. Anna was the day-to-day driving force in that effort, and was tireless in her devotion to his Presidency.

Once elected there was no one more supportive than SEIU in supporting his health care plan and his Presidency in general.

I personally took a certain amount of criticism for defending the Administration on numerous occasions.

I have never asked the President for anything until now, but I think it's important that you tell him that I very much want him to be aware of my complete support for Anna, and it would be very important to me that he intervene.

I also know that SEIU is completely supportive.

Thank you John, and I am glad to talk with anyone about this.

Amanda,
Happy to do this. But this should be more than a Colorado piece.

For context, Senators Kennedy and McCain and I worked very hard to pass comprehensive immigration reform in the Senate in 2006. Hillary was very supportive and a leader in these efforts. The legislation died in the Republican controlled House despite the strong push from President Bush. We tried again in 2007.

I do not know Senator's Sanders history on the matter, so it would be very useful for our HRC team to get me a background piece on Bernie's activity and votes over the years on comprehensive immigration reform. Then we can draft an oped that is supportive of Secretary Clinton's approach to immigration reform, and contrast her efforts to Bernie's. The piece can then be used in other States, besides Colorado-e.g., Nevada, Texas, Florida, etc.

Thank you.

Ken

For several years now, populist politicians and liberal intellectuals have been inveighing against income inequality, an issue that is gaining traction among the broader body politic, as shown by a recent New York Times/CBS News poll that found that nearly 60 percent of American voters want their government to do more to reduce the gap between the rich and the poor.

Subject:	[big campaign] Whose help will McCain look for next? Tom DeLay's?

Sorry for the multiple press releases today, but we couldn't let McCain's fundraiser hosted by Ralph Reed go by without a comment.

Release below. (Yes, Ralph Reed can be called a lobbyist, but that's probably the nicest thing I can think of to call him.)

DD

McCain To Accept Reed's Fundraising Help?

Watchdog Group Calls On McCain To Cancel Event With Abramoff Associate

Washington, D.C. – Campaign Money Watch, a nonpartisan campaign finance watchdog group, today called on Sen. John McCain (R-AZ) to cancel plans to attend an August 18th fundraiser for his presidential campaign – an event hosted by Ralph Reed, the former head of the Christian Coalition who went on to be a key associate of Jack Abramoff, the disgraced lobbyist now in federal prison for influence-peddling.

"Will the real John McCain stand up, already?" asked David Donnelly, director of Campaign Money Watch. "Sen. McCain knows exactly how Ralph Reed helped Jack Abramoff defraud Indian tribes out of tens of millions of dollars, and how Reed lobbied on Abramoff's behalf to protect sweatshop owners in the Northern Mariana Islands. Sen. McCain should spare himself any further embarrassment by canceling this event immediately. Whose help will he accept next? Tom DeLay's? "

Reed was a key figure in the scandal that resulted in his longtime friend Jack Abramoff being sent to prison in 2006. After stepping down as head of the Christian Coalition, Reed and Abramoff, along with others, participated in an elaborate scheme that involved Reed taking laundered money from one of Abramoff's Indian tribe clients to fund religious opposition to the efforts of other tribes to open casinos that would offer competition. In the process, Abramoff overcharged his clients by millions of dollars. Reed's consulting buisness received $5.3 million from his involvement in the plot.

While Reed was never charged with wrongdoing in the scandal, his ties to Abramoff played a significant role in his defeat in the 2006 Republican primary for lieutenant governor of Georgia. Campaign Money Watch aired ads ahead of that contest that mentioned his involvement with casinos as well as his efforts opposing legislation to protect workers in the Northern Marianas Islands, some of whom were forced to have abortions or engage in prostitution to keep their jobs.

Campaign Money Watch is a project of the nonpartisan Public Campaign Action Fund. The organization works to hold politicians who are against comprehensive campaign finance reform accountable for where they get their political donations.

Yes candidates frequently have a disability position paper on their website however they do not mention disability issues on the campaign trail and they don't ever do a disability event to outreach to the disability community.

MSNBC: Will a Hillary coronation crown the GOP nominee too?

By Benjy Sarlin and Alex Seitz-Wald

February 16, 2015 10:38 a.m. EST

The 2016 Republican presidential field is shaping up into a legendary free-for-all, with polls showing the race wide open and more candidates expressing interest by the day. Will it be Jeb Bush who consolidates establishment support? Can Rand Paul or Ted Cruz break through with a powerful grassroots coalition? Could Scott Walker thread the needle between both sides? What about Marco Rubio?

And then there's the Democratic side. Will it be Hillary Clinton who prevails? Or will–actually, you know what, it will probably just be Hillary Clinton.

While the former secretary of state hasn't even said whether she'll seek the party's nomination, her overwhelming dominance in polls, organization and endorsements raises the question of whether the Democratic vacuum might drag the Republican primary into its orbit – and even carry over into the general election.

It's a scenario that has veteran operatives from both parties talking in early primary and caucus states, where a Clinton coronation could prompt some less partisan voters to skip the Democratic contest and participate in the more competitive Republican race.

"If Hillary Clinton is viewed as having the Democratic caucus in the bag, Republicans will be vying for independents and other persuadable voters," Jeff Patch, a Republican strategist in Iowa and former state GOP spokesman, told msnbc.

"It's pretty typical if you don't have a heavily contested election that independents would be more interested in voting in a contested election," said Kathy Sullivan, the former chair of the New Hampshire Democratic Party.

Politicos for the most part see true blue Democrats leaping to the Republican side as an unlikely scenario, but the large, varied and poorly understood group of undeclared and independent voters are another story. In the right circumstances, a surge in participation could swing the race to the candidate who courts them hardest.

Independents Day

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The imbalance between the two parties would hardly be a first. After all, it was just four years ago that a crowded Republican field hogged the spotlight while President Obama went uncontested for re-election.

Republicans were hoping for a surge of interest and turnout in early states versus 2008, when the prolonged Democratic primary ended up boosting that party's registration in key states and strengthening Obama, the eventual nominee. The GOP surge didn't materialize in most cases, but with one key exception: Turnout did go up in states where independents could vote or easily switch their party registration on the day of the race, suggesting the lack of Democratic competition may have brought some crossover votes with it.

These include the critical contests of Iowa, where voters can change party registration at the caucus site on the day of the election; New Hampshire, where undeclared voters can vote in either party's primary; and South Carolina, which has a fully open primary. In that state, 25% of GOP primary voters described themselves as independents in 2012 exit polls, up from 18% in 2008. In New Hampshire, the number jumped from 34% in 2008 to 47% in 2012.

Political analysts sometimes sneer at the notion of true "independents," saying many behave like partisans or are on the fringes of electoral politics and hard to reach. In 2012, a significant chunk of tea party conservatives traded in their "R" for an "I," which lulled Mitt Romney supporters into the false belief that their candidate's lead with independents showed he was winning swing voters.

But that doesn't mean voters outside the traditional party bases aren't relevant, especially in a low turnout caucus or primary where even a small number of surprise votes can swing the outcome. In Iowa, a record 122,000 people showed up to vote in the 2012 Republican caucuses – but they were only about 19% of registered GOP voters.

"It's a bit of a self fulfilling prophecy," Ann Selzer, the pollster behind the famed Des Moines Register survey, said. "If candidates go in thinking the only way to win the caucuses is to turn out Christian conservatives, than that's how they campaign and that's who shows up."

That's what happened in Iowa in 2008 and 2012, when Mike Huckabee and Rick Santorum four years later rode social conservative support to victory. On the Democratic side, however, Obama toppled Clinton in 2008 in Iowa thanks to an intense organizing effort that enlisted thousands of new caucus-goers, including independents. The then-Illinois senator won that group in the caucuses by an 18 point margin over second-place finisher John Edwards. It's possible that in 2016, the right candidate could accomplish something similar on the GOP side.

One Republican candidate in particular is building their campaign hopes around this idea: Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul. "I think Rand Paul has an early edge in trying to expand the Republican electorate," Patch, the former Iowa GOP spokesman, said.

The Kentucky senator's father, former Congressman Ron Paul, finished a strong third in Iowa's 2012 caucuses while winning 43% of independents, and a distant second in libertarian-heavy New Hampshire while also leading the field with independents at 31%. The younger Paul has spent the last four years pitching the GOP on attracting younger voters and minorities, even if they're in the other party's camp, by promoting causes like sentencing reform and protection from federal surveillance.

Doug Stafford, a senior Paul adviser, told msnbc Paul is "certainly well positioned to reach out to Independents and Democrats, whether that is in a primary or a general election," in addition to Republicans.

Paul "seems to cross party lines, particularly with younger voters," Stephen Duprey, the former chairman of the New Hampshire GOP, told msnbc.

But while Paul has been most explicit about appealing outside the Republican box, he's not the only candidate who could benefit from an inflated independent vote if they play their cards right. Duprey noted that centrist Republicans have performed well in New Hampshire by targeting independents, who made up close to half of GOP primary voters in 2012.

The most famous example is John McCain, who romped to an upset victory in the Granite State over George W. Bush in 2000 thanks in part to a staggering 41-point lead with independents. They played a big role in McCain's crucial 2008 South Carolina primary win as well in which he narrowly defeated Mike Huckabee in part by winning independents by a 17-point margin. Perhaps someone like Jeb Bush could make a similar play to offset conservatives upset with his position on Common Core education standards and immigration reform.

Democratic Danger

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Whether or not an individual Republican candidate can ride independent support to victory, party officials are hoping a more competitive race will give them an extended opportunity to make their pitch to persuadable voters that carries over into the general election.

“I think theres a danger on the part of the Democrats in settling too early and I think, quite frankly, that helps us,” Iowa GOP chair Jeff Kaufmann told msnbc. “We have an electorate that’s still searching, and some of the energy might carry over into the independents.”

Democrats are aware that contested primaries in swing states like Iowa and New Hampshire may give the GOP a head start when it comes to organizing voters. Primary campaigns invest months and millions of dollars on identifying, persuading, and mobilizing voters on behalf of their individual candidates, and all that work can end end up benefiting the party’s nominee as well.

“Folks who turn out to vote in primaries are much, much more likely to turn out to vote in the fall,” Josh Putnam, a professor of government at Appalachian State University who runs election site Frontloading HQ, told msnbc.

To confront this issue, Obama’s reelection campaign began preparing for the 2012 general election in 2011, using the remnants of his 2008 campaign and the Democratic National Committee to pummel Republican frontrunner Mitt Romney in early primary states and organize Democrats. When the primaries did roll around, his campaign used them as a dry run to test get-out-the-vote efforts ahead of the general election.

Clinton will still need to compete in those primaries, but she can take a page from Obama in organizing early even if she doesn’t face a serious challenger. It may be a tough task to keep voters’ interest in her campaign, even though many will view her candidacy as a forgone conclusion, but Democrats say she can stay relevant by varying her message as time goes on, layering one rationale for a run on top of another.

Mitch Stewart, one of Obama’s top organizers from both the 2008 and 2012 campaigns, and current advisor to the pro-Clinton super PAC Ready for Hillary, acknowledged the challenge, but said he’s not too concerned about it. “If the Republican primary is more interesting, that doesn’t mean that we’re doomed in the general election,” he said.

He recalled an example from his work during the 2004 election cycle for Edwards in Iowa. President George W. Bush was running for reelection and had no primary, so Republicans spent far less time organizing in the state. “In 2003, when I was in Iowa working on the caucus, there were five or six [Democratic] campaigns actively working the states for the year, and I remember leaving the state and thinking, there’s no way a Democrat will lose in Iowa in 2004,” he said.

Bush ended up narrowly defeating John Kerry in Iowa en route to his re-election.

Associated Press: Potential 2016 Presidential Candidates Face A Big Learning Curve

By Nancy Benac

February 16, 2015 9:43 a.m. EST

If you're an aspiring presidential candidate, says professional crisis manager Eric Dezenhall, right now is "a great time to take a pratfall because it's so far away from anything major."

That's a good thing because so many of the candidates' feet have been sliding out from under them.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The first six weeks of 2015 have featured mangled messages, snappishness, a bad hire and other flubs from the Republicans who would be president.

It's pretty much to be expected in the earliest stages of a campaign with just short of a gazillion potential candidates who haven't done this before.

In recent days:

—Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush cut loose a new hire with a history of inappropriate comments about women, gays and blacks.

—New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie and Kentucky Sen. Rand Paul struggled to strike the right tone on whether parents should have to vaccinate their children.

—Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker caught flak for ducking questions and picking a fight with the revered University of Wisconsin.

Candidates-in-waiting got peevish. They gave underwhelming speeches. They tried to disavow their own words. And so on.

Do these responses sound like guys who are ready to be president?

Do you believe in evolution, Gov. Walker? "I'm going to punt on that one."

What about the Islamic State group, Gov. Christie? "Is there something you don't understand about, 'No questions?'"

It's part of the long and brutal learning curve for a presidential race, where even seasoned politicians find the scrutiny more intense than for lesser offices.

Dezenhall calls this the season of "gaffe congestion" for would-be candidates and says 20 months out from Election Day 2016 is a good time to get them over with.

In an earlier time, even eight years ago or 12, none of this recent drama would have been much more than a paragraph in the saga that is a presidential race.

"Now, thanks to Twitter and the immediacy of political commentary, mistakes are much more painful," says Ari Fleischer, a communications consultant who was President George W. Bush's press secretary.

Still, he says, the best candidates will learn from their early stumbles and quickly regain their stride.

Jeb Bush's team probably will check out future job applicants more carefully. A less bombastic Christie was back working in Iowa not long after snapping at reporters in London. Walker turned to Twitter to at least explain, somewhat, his thinking on evolution after his refusal to answer a question on the subject during his own trip to London became a distraction.

"Much of what's happening right now won't be remembered a year from now or in a general election," says Stephanie Cutter, a veteran of Democratic presidential campaigns for Barack Obama and John Kerry. She said part of the problem may be that potential candidates don't yet have a full complement of campaign staff.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

But she also said that some of the recent commotion, such as the vaccine flap, could signal a dynamic that will carry forward in the race as GOP candidates try to cater to primary voters without tacking so far to the right that it causes them trouble in the general election.

It's also clear that even if regular voters aren't tuned in yet, the potential candidates are being sized up by donors, activists and potential staff who will be crucial to helping them run an effective campaign.

Mo Elleithee, communications director for the Democratic National Committee, predicts that some of the recent GOP missteps could turn out to be particularly telling for voters in the long run.

Christie and Paul, with their bluster and argumentative interaction with the press, are "letting people see who they really are," he said.

For now, Democrats can largely sit back and enjoy the GOP clatter because expected candidate Hillary Rodham Clinton has the experience of the 2008 Democratic primaries on her resume and is expected to face little primary opposition this time.

But Fleischer said even Clinton will have an adjustment to make if she jumps back into the presidential mosh pit after eight years of "the paid speaker's life, which is scrutiny-free, and the charmed life of a secretary of state, where you're not covered in the same way you are in political campaigns."

Dezenhall said one skill that candidates on both sides will need to learn early on is damage control — both how to respond and what safely can be ignored — because errors are inevitable.

"Politics used to be about where you stood," he said. "Now, it's about what you stepped in."

CNN: 'President' Hillary Clinton: Good for stocks?

By Patrick Gillespie

February 16, 2015 10:35 a.m. EST

President Bill Clinton brought Wall Street arguably its best bull market ever. There's historical precedent to believe Hillary -- or any Democrat in the White House -- could deliver even more good times to investors.

Overall, stocks perform better under Democratic presidents than Republican ones, according to S&P Capital IQ.

In the last 100 years, the S&P 500 (SPX) had about a 12% median annual gain during the tenures of Democratic presidents. Republican presidents only saw a median rise of just over 5% a year.

Of course, any analysis comes with the large disclaimer that the past is no predictor of future returns. But investors have started to take notice.

'90s throwback? President Clinton is in a league of his own when it comes to stock market performance. The S&P 500 rose by a total of 210% during his two terms, well ahead of any recent president. To put that in context, the index has grown 160% since Obama took office.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

There's hope that Hillary would bring more of the same.

"She would be very well received," by Wall Street, says Greg Valliere, chief political strategist at Potomac Research Group. "There's a certain comfort level there because of Bill."

Gridlock city: Hillary -- or any Democrat in the executive branch -- would likely continue the gridlock between the White House and a Republican-led Congress. Considering the opposition Bill faced from a GOP Congress, that may not be a bad scenario for markets.

When Congress is split, the S&P 500 gains 10% a year with Democratic presidents and 3% a year with Republicans presidents, according to data from Standard & Poor Equity Research.

For better or worse, gridlock means no significant reforms to Wall Street. Investors like that, says Valliere.

"The markets, in general, can live with gridlock," Valliere says. "They pass less activist legislation."

Bush, Clinton compete on the Street: As the election nears, all the candidates' policies will be in the spotlight.

The most formidable candidate competing for Wall Street's hearts, minds and checkbooks so far is former Florida Governor Jeb Bush. No stranger to Wall Street, Bush recently quit a stint as an adviser to investment bank Barclays.

Investors' views of any candidates could hinge on one big issue for corporate America: cybersecurity, says Kristina Hooper, U.S. investment strategist at Allianz Global Investors.

Almost 90% of CEOs say cybersecurity is their top priority this year, according to a recent survey by investment bank Piper Jaffray. TurboTax and Anthem can speak from experience.

"It is a huge issue now among corporate leaders," Hooper says. Cybersecurity "is completely under the radar now for investors in terms of the election [and that] could really come to the fore in the next 18 months."

How much does a president do? Of course, some point out that a president's policies don't really drive the markets much. These days, every investor is hanging on the words and actions of Federal Reserve Chair Janet Yellen, and when the Fed decides to raise interest rates.

Love it or hate it, the Fed's stimulus program undoubtedly played a major role in the U.S. economy over the past six years.

"Sometimes we ascribe more influence by administrations to the performance of the economy and the financial markets than they really deserve," says Ed Yardeni, president of Yardeni Research, an investment strategy firm.

NBC News: 2016 Off To Slower Start Than Previous Cycles. Really.

By Shaquille Brewster

February 16, 2015

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

It's President's Day, less than a year away from the first votes being cast in the 2016 presidential race and just one major candidate has announced his intention to formally launch a campaign through an exploratory committee. At this point eight years ago (the last time there was a pending vacancy in the Oval Office), most candidates had either already announced or were days away from making their grand entrances into the presidential contest.

Just look at what the political landscape looked like by President's Day weekend in 2007.

For Democrats:

Mike Gravel announced in April 2006

Tom Vilsack (currently U.S. Agriculture Secretary) launched his candidacy in Nov. 2006

Dennis Kucinich announced in Dec. 2006

John Edwards announced in Dec. 2006

Chris Dodd announced on Jan. 11, 2007

Hillary Clinton announced on Jan. 20

Bill Richardson announced on Jan. 21

Joe Biden announced on Jan. 31

Barack Obama announced on Feb. 10

Tom Vilsack was preparing to withdraw the next week to endorse Hillary Clinton.

For Republicans:

Duncan Hunter announced on Oct. 30

Sam Brownback announced on Jan. 20

Mike Huckabee announced on Meet the Press Jan. 28

Mitt Romney announced on Feb. 13

Rudy Giuliani confirms his candidacy on Feb. 14

John McCain was preparing to announce on David Letterman on Feb. 28

In fact, many of the candidates listed above officially launched exploratory committees well before their formal and ceremonial announcements.

This year, Former Virginia Senator Jim Webb is the only major candidate to say he is launching an exploratory committee (technically there are 165 federally registered 2016 candidates race).

"Whether people are formally declared—or not—isn't the whole story here, they're running anyway"

Despite the formal announcements, staffs are growing, donors are being locked down, and book tours and trips to Iowa and New Hampshire are increasing. A glance at the speakers at the Republican cattle calls last month—or the one coming up in March— will show a list of "likely" candidates giving policy speeches and openly working to build support.

Instead of creating the exploratory committees, these "likely" candidates have launched their own fundraising groups that allow them spend money for political activities. Out of the major candidates, 15 potential republicans and two democratic candidates have announced forming these Leadership PACs or 527s.

University of Maryland Government and Politics Professor David Karol studies elections and agrees this election cycle is developing slower than previous years, but warns that's not the entire picture.

"Whether people are formally declared—or not—isn't the whole story here, they're running anyway," Karol explained to NBC News.

"I think if Jeb [Bush] is going around making speeches on key issues, getting reported on by you guys, talking to Republicans in key states, then" Karol continued, "he's out there and people know he's out there."

John,

I have today interviewed Jim Miller and am very happy to recommend that the President-elect name him as Principal Deputy Under Secretary for Policy (Michele's principal deputy).

I also interviewed retired Lt. Gen Chip Gregson and am quite pleased to recommend that the President-elect name him as Assistant Secretary of Defense (Policy) for Asia-Pacific. I did not mention the P&R job to him and I know Michele feels very strongly about not losing him for the Asia-Pacific role. I will leave the decision on which job he goes to up to you all; I am comfortable with him in either.

Finally, I interviewed Sandy Vershbow for Assistant Secretary (Policy) for International Security Affairs, and would be more than happy to have him join the team here. He is absolutely first rate, and so I recommend the President-elect name him to Assistant Secretary/ISA job.

John, thanks for sending me high quality candidates. I am very satisfied with this process.

La Terra «senza male» di Susan Kleinberg

Al Chiostro del Bramante, ancora una settimana per vedere le opere dell'artista che ha stupito Venezia

ROMA - Dalle illusioni prospettiche del Bramante al sogno di una vita migliore, di una Tierra sin Males «dove non basta l'utopia per reggere in equilibrio il mondo». E' il pensiero dell'argentino Adolfo Perez Esquivel, Nobel per la Pace nel 1980, a suggerire titolo e tema al video della mostra di quadri e stampe «Tierra sin Males» dell'artista americana Susan Kleimberg, in corso fino al 4 novembre nel Chiostro del Bramante (tel. 06.68809036, via della Pace). La mostra è accompagnata da un film che racconta la sua installazione più famosa, quella presentata nel giugno 2009 a Venezia.

When Chelsea Clinton was in elementary school, she used to cut up the plastic rings on six packs of soda in an effort to make the world a safer place for dolphins and other marine life.

Now she's hoping to inspire a new generation of boys and girls to help save the planet, with her first book, It's Your World: Get Informed, Get Inspired & Get Going.

In the book, Clinton breaks down issues like poverty, homelessness and climate change, and shares stories of kids and teens who are making an impact in their own communities and around the world. The book, due out on Sept. 15, 2015, is for children ages 10 to 14.

"That's the age when I started tuning in more to issues I cared about and trying to make a difference," Clinton, 35, tells PEOPLE. "I loved the book 50 Simple Things Kids Can Do to Save the Earth and remember wishing there were books like that on other issues I cared about. This book is my attempt to do that for kids today."

Being a new mom to Charlotte, her 7-month-old daughter with husband Marc Mezvinsky, also inspired Clinton to write It's Your World.

"I wanted my daughter to grow up in a world where kids are informed about what's happening, feel empowered to make a difference and ultimately take action on issues they care about," the former First Daughter explains. "Now, being a mom, somehow I care even more intensely about trying to make that happen."

(Baby Charlotte already has a head start on staying informed. In fact, Clinton and her family members read to Charlotte so much that grandmother Hillary Clinton joked her first words might be, "Enough with the reading.")

Thankfully, Charlotte is a "great napper," which allowed her mom plenty of time to work on her book, Clinton tells PEOPLE.

It's Your World was edited by Jill Santopolo, the executive editor at Philomel Books, who reached out to Clinton after seeing her speak eloquently about father Bill Clinton 's heart surgery during an appearance on The Daily Show in September 2013.

"She was a storyteller. Soon after, I reached out to her, asking if she'd be interested in writing a book for kids," Santopolo says in a statement to PEOPLE. "It was a shot in the dark, I thought, but the answer came back and was a resounding yes."

Clinton, who will be donating proceeds from the book to several charities, has come a long way from her plastic ring campaign days. But "more than two decades later, I still feel the same way," she writes in a letter to the reader. "I want to do my part to make a difference – and that's why I wrote this book."

Subject: Chelsea Book Announcement

Hi Team –
Exciting day here for team CVC. The announcement of Chelsea's book, It's Your World: Get Informed, Get Inspired & Get Going! will come around 9:00am today via an exclusive with PEOPLE.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Attached are the documents that will be provided to the press as well as a VERY CONFIDENTIAL AND VERY WORKING DRAFT Q&A Document that we will use as a frame to answer any questions that might come our way.

Plan for today:
9:00 AM - PEOPLE breaks news of book, exclusively.
11:000 AM - ITS YOUR WORLD website goes live (penguin.com/itsyourworld). The website will have the cover art, press release, author letter and behind the book note as well as the author photo that will be used on the book jacket.
11:05 AM – CVC will tweet something along the lines of: I believe we can all make a difference, because #ItsYourWorld. Coming 9/15/15 penguin.com/itsyourworld
12:30 PM/AFTERNOON – Penguin should be able to feed out all the digital sales information, so the website will be refreshed to include a 'pre-order book option' which will direct people to their retailers and/or e-reader pre-order pages

CVC will do no further press on Wednesday.

Chelsea has been working tirelessly on this project and I think we are all going to be really proud of the final product. Any and all support you all can provide to make sure we keep this about the substance is much appreciated.

Please let me know if you have any questions!

Thank you,
Bari

Close of business June 19th. Happy Juneteenth.
African-Americans celebrating their learning of the Emancipation Proclamation by President Lincoln.

Still no word from President Obama on how or if he or his Administration will recognize the 10th Anniversary of the US Supreme Court's Olmstead Decision. Will he invite Lois Curtis to the White House? Will Secretary Sebelius call for the end of the institutional bias? Can't stand all this anticipation. This is more exciting than the drama created by what kind of dog the President would select for his children. I imagine the 2.2 million people in nursing homes and other institutions as well as the 300,000 people on waiting lists don't care much about the dog but might be interested on what President Obama says on June 22. 2009. For them BENIGN NEGLECT is a statement that their lives are less worthy. Let's continue to hope CHANGE is not just a campaign slogan as it relates to the "institutional bias".

For an Institution Free America

June 17th. Have y'all received your invite to the White House for the celebration of the 10th Anniversary of the Supreme Court's Olmstead decision? Neither have I. Daniel Patrick Moynihan coined a term which I think best describes the Obama Administration's approach to the institutional bias: BENIGN NEGLECT!

Refusal to include LTSS in health care reform. No public statement about the removal of the institutional bias from the President or any senior policy advisor. No policy reforms from HHS on removing the institutional. Refusal to respond to letters calling on them to detail what plans they have to implement Olmstead.

The sound of silence is sending a clear message that the disability community is not high on their priority list.

Hopefully I'm wrong. Let's watch what they do not what they say.

Accountability.

Subject:	Why Polls Have Been Wrong Recently - The New York Times

This is an interesting statistical analysis that backs up my theory of the election, that turnout is the key and that Hillary faces greater danger than polling indicates because of her enthusiasm gap. That the danger is that because of her enthusiasm gap the 2016 general election could be closer to the turnout pattern of midterm elections than most presidential elections have been. If my theory of 2016 is correct Hillary will underperform compared to her pre-voting polling numbers and Bernie and Cruz, and possibly Trump, will overperform and receive a higher percentage of the actual vote than pre-voting polling suggests.

This also explains my observation in recent years of foreign polling that the right has performed better than a string of pre-election polling in a number of nations such as Israel, Britain, Poland and U.S. Midterms.

However this patten was broken in the Canadian election, where Trudeau outperformed, and in the recent French regional elections where the national front dramatically underperformed in actual voting in the second round lower than first round voting and pre-election polling before the second round as voters had to make the power decision of actual electing they pulled back from the far right.

Net net the biggest danger to Hillary, in my opinion, is not Bernie or Republicans but Hillary. The nature of her calculating and maneuvering political style is an enthusiasm reducer, in the same way and for similar reasons that Obama had the exact same result in 2010 and 2014 midterms of depressing Democratic voters and energizing Republican voters.

This is why I have long believed that nobody will win in 2016, the issue is which candidate loses in 2016.....whether Hillary depresses more voters through the enthusiasm gap she generates or whether the Republican right will look strong in primaries but weaken in the general election as the national front did in the recent French elections. Either outcome is possible. If we add a new variable, a potential major terror attack in America in the months before the election, there is a conceivable scenario in which a rightist candidate is elected president because her Secretary of State experience becomes more of a negative, because she will share blame with Obama for the attack, while Republican and rightist turnout soars through the charts on the upside because of anger and fear.

This is how I suggest viewing the Pew study referred to in this story:

BY JAMES HOHMANN

THE BIG IDEA:

It's another all-hands-on-deck night in The Post's newsroom. We've got dozens of journalists, including five on the ground in Boulder, Colo., preparing blow-by-blow coverage from fact checks to in-depth analysis. The undercard debate starts on CNBC at 6 p.m. Eastern. The main event with the top 10 candidates begins at 8 p.m. EST.

If you're watching at home, I strongly encourage you to follow along on our robust live blog. (It's accessible here .)

— What are the pros watching for? This afternoon I asked my colleagues on the Post's politics team, all living and breathing this campaign, what they're watching tonight:

Dan Balz: "Looks like a night of bumper cars. Lots of potential collisions that could occur. And then there is John Kasich's shot across the bow. Candidates seem ready to break the rules. Would be surprised if there are not interruptions."

Karen Tumulty: "Will any of the other Republican candidates attack the new Iowa front-runner, Dr. Ben Carson? His favorable ratings are stratospheric, so they do it at their peril."

Matea Gold: "The must-see-TV factor tonight: the inevitable Trump-Carson engagement. Will Trump get a rise out of Carson? And will Cruz find a savvy way to navigate their tension and pull more conservatives to his camp? The secondary drama will be all about Bush and Rubio. I'm really curious to see which Jeb shows up: the scolding figure on display in South Carolina Saturday, or the upbeat, happy warrior who charmed donors in Houston on Sunday and Monday? And lastly: will anyone call Trump on his ties to the super PAC that disbanded last week?"

Chris Cillizza: "WWJD: What Will Jeb Do? He has to find a way to make himself heard from in this debate after two forgettable performances and reports that his campaign was forced into cutbacks amid a fundraising shortage. Does he attack Trump? Carson? Rubio? All three? None? This is a guy who has always been uncomfortable getting down in the mud to win campaigns, but it looks like he might have to tonight."

David Weigel: "I'm looking for Rand Paul to out-denounce everyone in his approach to Washington; he's been insisting that no one else credibly can destroy the IRS or pass a

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Balanced Budget Amendment. And I'm looking for Mike Huckabee to be the lone, full-bore defender of Social Security as it is."

Abby D. Phillip has been exploring why Carly Fiorina has faded so much since her breakout performance last month: "Her last debate polling bump is long gone, so she has a lot to prove. Can the one-time rising star of this Republican primary impress again? The former CEO will have a natural advantage: tonight's CNBC debate will be heavily focused on economic and business issues — her strength. But she will need to stand out on a stage of big personalities."

Jenna Johnson, on the Trump beat, was with The Donald in Iowa last night. She wonders how he will respond if he's no longer the center of attention: "In the past week, Trump has at times seemed to struggle with how to tactfully go after Carson, so it will be interesting to see if he takes the lead on that tonight or let's his opponents have at it."

Philip Rucker is most interested in the Carson factor: "How does he handle policy-specific questions from the debate moderators? How will other candidates handle him? Will any attack? Donald Trump has begun hitting Carson hard and is likely to amplify his attacks on the debate stage. But will other candidates, such as Ted Cruz, draw contrasts with Carson considering that the mild-mannered doctor now stands in their way in Iowa?"

Katie Zezima, who travels with Ted Cruz, is interested to see if the Texas senator tries to insert himself more in this debate and if he more explicitly sharpens the contrasts with his rivals. In recent weeks, he has still been effusive about Trump on the trail, but Katie has noticed a subtle shift. Cruz now says that Trump has reframed the central question of the primary as: Who will stand up to Washington? "I'm wondering if he's going to draw a distinction between himself and Carson, now the front-runner, and Bush and Rubio, and if he'll put any daylight between himself and Trump."

Sean Sullivan: "Jeb Bush's top aides wouldn't have branded Marco Rubio a 'GOP Obama' in a presentation to major donors on Monday if they weren't prepared for it to come up during tonight's debate. In the first two debates, the exchanges between Rubio and Bush were pretty tame. That could change tonight. Watch to see how aggressive Bush is against his longtime friend and whether Rubio wants to engage him. It will say a lot about the tone of the campaign moving forward."

Ed O'Keefe: "Does Jeb's physical distance from Trump make him more willing to attack the frontrunner? And how will he confront Rubio standing right next to him?"

Jose DelReal: "Kasich's outburst yesterday was super interesting because it speaks to how frustrated establishment candidates are feeling about being 'demonized,' in Bush's words, for being reasonable. They are having serious trouble messaging on the lacking political tenability that underlies many ideas put forward by Trump and Carson. The problem is that when they DO bring up how impractical some of these proposals are (Kasich on health care; Christie on Social Security; Bush on immigration), they turn off huge swaths of GOP voters AND also implicitly criticize those voters as impractical."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Anne Gearan: "The next president will inherit the morass in Iraq and Syria. With word this week that U.S. troops will be back on the ground in Iraq, albeit under very limited circumstances, I'd like to hear candidates either propose a true exit strategy or say plainly that they envision an ongoing U.S. military presence."

David Fahrenthold will watch closely to see how Carson responds if pressed on Medicare, guns and immigration. But he's also looking forward to the undercard: "I'd also like to see if Lindsey Graham is still hung over. 'No bright lights!'"

Again, please follow our live blog for updates from these reporters and many others.

BREAKING THIS AFTERNOON: Bush now wants to "phase out" the sugar subsidy. This puts him at odds with and to the right of Rubio on an issue important to fiscal conservatives, many of whom decry the special breaks as "crony capitalism" at its worse. Tom Hamburger notes that Bush's position comes as he retools his operation to focus on early-voting states, including Iowa, where the corn industry is preparing to begin an ad campaign attacking the subsidy. Bush's campaign said he's held this position for awhile now, but it caught industry players and old allies off guard. Rubio, who has steadfastly defended the special breaks, is being backed in a big way this year by members of the Florida-based Fanjul family, which controls one of the world's biggest sugar empires. In light of his scoop, Hamburger wonders: "Will the candidates address the issue of agriculture subsidies, a tough but revealing question given the upcoming Iowa caucuses?"

Q9) On employment numbers, everything you talk about are long-range plans. Do you think there is short-term relief, like extension of unemployment benefits and insurance benefits?

MCCAIN: Yes I think we have to do all of those things. Also, This brings me to the gas tax holiday. All I wanted to do was give Americans a little relief. Obama opposed that as a "gimmick." I've talked to a lot of Americans, especially older Americans, who wish they had this. I think it's out of touch with average Americans not to want this. - Gov. Crist and Congressman Diaz-Balart were with McCain.
- Small- to mid-sized gaggle of national/traveling and local press
- Event took place on site of the Everglades Safari Park near Miami. McCain did not appear to weather the heat too well—appeared very sweaty.

Opening Remarks

MCCAIN: On the topic of FISA. I've always said I'd obey any law that's passed by the US congress. Right now the courts are taking up issues of powers of President. Unfortunately FISA bill is hung up in the House – hopefully they'll be able to get something good done. Our ability to counter terrorists acts is impeded by our failure to pass the FISA bill. Therefore it is a priority. I believe the telecoms companies shouldn't be retroactively held liable for cooperating with our govt's requests to monitor communications from and with other countries. We need to pass the FISA bill that went through the Senate – this clears up a lot of the ambiguities.

Press Avail

- Q1) KELLY O'DONNELL: Prior to this revamping of FISA, do you feel Pres Bush overreached his authority?

MCCAIN: No. one court said he was legal in what he did. Other courts have said he was not. the whole issue can be resolved by passing this FISA bill. I'm not interested in going back… let's move forward. Let's address the challenge we face today to counter individuals that threaten this country.

- Q2) Dems have been critical of you for not supporting the WRDA (Water Resources Development Act)? They said you didn't get it, that it wasn't an appropriations bill; it was an authorization bill.

MCCAIN: I'm astonished that they are critical of me. Yeah it was a bill will 900 projects on it, with $58B already on the books. They added another $23B. this is the game in DC. And then the appropriators pick which one of those projects that are authorized to fund. That's how you get museums funded rather than the Everglades restored. I'm glad that Feingold and I worked on it. And McCaskill. I'm disappointed that Obama became part of the same old system, not only authorizing pork-barrel projects but seeking 10s of millions of dollars in earmarks in his short time in the Senate. They don't get it. The American people are fed up with wasting money and out of control spending. We've spent trillions that have exceeded our budget.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Q3) That water bill as an example. If you're elected, the authorizations committee isn't going to change. How are you going to work with them?
  MCCAIN: I'll make them famous. They'll know their names. The Americans people resoundingly reject this practice which has mortgage our childrens futures.

- Q4) jobless numbers. How can you convince Americans that you're better to help than Obama?
  MCCAIN: I should've mentioned that in my intro comments. This is the worst # in 22 years, I'm told. Americans are hurting.
  - (1) Get spending under control.
  - (2) We need to give people FHA loans so they can stay in their homes,
  - (3) don't raise taxes, eliminate our dependence on foreign oil because it's hurting us on gas prices,
  - we have to restore trust and confidence in our govt ability to restrain spending.
  - (4) Invest in job training and education programs to help people that have lost their jobs or those that are about their jobs.
  - It's going to require change, the right kind of change. Obama wants to go back to big govt of 1960s. we will recover. The question is how long and how hard it's gonna be. I have fundamental optimism about the economy.

- Q5) What's your position on whether Jersualem should be the undivided capital of Israel? Reaction to Obama's comments on the subject.
  MCCAIN: I can't react to every comment by Obama because it will probably change, as it did with sitting down with Ahmadenijad. Jerusualem is undivided, it's the capital. We should move our embassy to Jerusalem before anything else happens. The subject will be addressed by the Israeli govt and people.

- Q6) Response to Obama's criticism that cap and trade program didn't go far enough? And what more would you do?
  MCCAIN: I've been heaving engaged on this issue since 2001. I know of none on Obama's part. I have fought this administration tooth and nail about this. I've done everything I can to make my constituents and America aware of the problems of global warming. McCain – Lieberman was not perfect, but it's far better than a carbon tax.

- Q7) Reporter apologizes for hoarse; stumbles.
  MCCAIN: – I get that way myself.
- Q7) How do you get money to Everglades. Crist has lobbied DC far for this in Washington.
  MCCAIN: There are 900 projects proposed in this bill. Isn't the Everglades of sufficient urgency that it shouldn't be tied with all these other projects, like museums? It should be a stand-alone appropriation. I'll encourage Congress to care. I'll try to educate the American people that we're all in this together.

- Q8) follow up on emissions trading. Obama's criticism is not about the overall aim of your plan, but rather the plan auction permits to factories instead of giving them away. How do you feel about that?
  MCCAIN: I have worked in bipartisan effort for years. We don' come up with perfect solutions. I know of no record of Obama's. I'd like to see him come up with his own proposal and I'll examine it. I am committed to this issue and have a clear record, so people can have confidence.

- Q9) On employment numbers, everything you talk about are long-range plans. Do you think there is short-term relief, like extension of unemployment benefits and insurance benefits?
  MCCAIN: Yes I think we have to do all of those things. Also, This brings me to the gas tax holiday. All I wanted to do was give Americans a little relief. Obama opposed that as a "gimmick." I've talked to a lot of Americans, especially older Americans, who wish they had this. I think it's out of touch with average

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Americans not to want this. We need to examine every option, short-term and long-term.

- Q10) Start of hurricane season, and Floridians are worried about skyrocketing property insurance. Obama campaign says they support national catastrophic insurance and say you oppose it.
  MCCAIN: I discussed this in the primary with straight talk. The bill that passed the House would never pass the Senate. We will establish risk pools and ways to provide insurance to all states at risk of hurricanes. I don't think it's fair just to do this for the state of FL. We'll come up with comprehensive insurance that will take care of a risk for all people of Gulf states.
- FOLLOWUP- but you voted against the WRDA bill.
  MCCAIN: And I'm so happy that I did. It was littered and filled with pork projects. And there's a ton of projects that have been authorized that haven't been funded. We've fought to get it prioritized but it's not.

- Q11) yesterday's report on Iraq. What is your feeling about that and does that change your early support on Iraq?
  MCCAIN: Every intelligence agency in the world concluded that Saddam had WMDs and was planning to use them. The sanctions were breaking down, American planes were being shot down, there was a multibillion oil for food scandal in the UN, the world is better without Hussein. The problem was the early mishandling of the war. I warned against that. I proposed the strategy that is now succeeding. Obama has never acknowledged this. And has never arranged a meeting with Petraeus, which is especially bad since he doesn't have experience in military. We're winning. If we'd done what Obama had wanted, we'd have had chaos and genocide in the region and elevation of Iran. I'll stand on my record and I'm proud of it and I'm proud of the people serving who will tell obama he was wrong.

- Q12) Can Congressman Diaz and Gov. Crist comment on McCain's opposition to the WRDA bill?
  - CONGRESSMAN DIAZ: McCain has always been consistent. it was a $23B bill out of which $2B was for Everglades. McCain has been consistent not supporting pork. Everglades was part of a big bill. McCain has been very consistent on Everglades restoration.
  - CRIST: McCain is right. If they'd been able to separate it out and prioritize it, much more important to a museum in MS…
  - MCCAIN: You want to say something in Spanish?
  - DIAZ: [in Spanish] "gang leader" on the restoration of Everglades. He's been very consistent.
  - MCCAIN: "I agree with every word he just said."

Dear Commissioners, amigas y amigos (as David and Trevor say),

I hope you are all doing well. It has been some time since we met in NY to take stock of our progress, and work together on how to best push forward our Report's recommendations encompassing a 'recovery package' for the Ocean. We co-chairs and Secretariat, came away from that meeting with our 'batteries charged' by your energy and ongoing commitment to our objectives, dear Commissioners.

You will find attached to this e-mail a letter which brings you up to date on accomplishments since we met. We are also asking you for advise on raising $100,000 (one hundred thousand dollars) for a very specific strategic objective. I would appreciate your comments on this as soon as possible.

Thank you again for all your work, and your active engagement in our Commission.

All the best and kind regards,
Jm

Subject:	[big campaign] Palin Supported... Pat Buchanan

http://www.thenation.com/blogs/jstreet/350730/sarah_palin_buchananite

Very quickly. Remember when Pat Buchanan ran a number of hard-right, fringe campaigns for president in the late 1980s, 1990s and 2000? Well, guess who was supporting him:

From an AP report in 1999:

"Pat Buchanan brought his conservative message of a smaller government and an America First foreign policy to Fairbanks and Wasilla on Friday as he continued a campaign swing through Alaska. Buchanan's strong message championing states rights resonated with the roughly 85 people gathered for an Interior Republican luncheon in Fairbanks. … Among those sporting Buchanan buttons were Wasilla Mayor Sarah Palin and state Sen. Jerry Ward, R-Anchorage."

In fact, a very committed Buchananite I talked to today was thrilled by the choice, saying as soon as I mentioned it: "It's great for the base. I'm pretty sure she's a Buchananite!"

People seem to be missing the fact that this is a classic, Rovian appease-the-base choice.

Because of the outstanding work of Matt, Michael, Michelle and our INCREDIBLE organizing team in Iowa, tomorrow could be an important opportunity to reinforce fundamental strengths of our campaign--that HRC listened to Iowans, earned their support by proposing realistic plans to deliver real results, and worked hard to build the biggest grassroots organization in Iowa caucus history to turn out her supporters.

The Iowa team has created a great tick-tock of up-to-the-minute organizing and turnout numbers we can use to set up this argument tomorrow. One of our most important objectives on our 1pm call is to all align around this plan. Stay tuned!

There will be a staff room at HRC's hotel tomorrow night that IS open to everyone on this email but NOT open to others (HRC/WJC will be there), so PLEASE keep it's existence a well-guarded secret! As everyone knows, the caucuses happen FAST...we will probably have a decent picture of turnout between 7:15-7:30 and an idea of the outcome 7:30-8pm. We will send live updates on the email chain but they are NOT for public consumption unless expressly noted in the email. The purpose of the chain is to keep us, HRC, and WJC updated in real time.

CHUCK TODD: for more reaction, i'm joined by john podesta of hillary clinton's presidential campaign. mr. podesta, welcome back to "meet the press."

JOHN PODESTA: nice to meet you, sir.

CHUCK TODD: let me ask you to something secretary clinton said last night about donald trump and isis. fact checkers can't say it. she said definitively it is being used for propaganda. where do you get this information? do you have information that we don't have?

JOHN PODESTA: chuck, your own network ran a piece citing the most important organization that follows isis on social media that said they're using social media and using donald trump as a recruitment tool so that's what she was referencing and that's the interpretation we made and i think if you look at what's going on in the middle east the fact that mr. trump is on television over there all the time, the fact that isis is using him as a recruitment tool, it's a very fair charge.

CHUCK TODD: i understand what you're referring to --

JOHN PODESTA: he's becoming a very important recruitment tool for isis.

CHUCK TODD: i understand what you're referring to and there was concern he would become an important recruitment tool. she said it definitively, declaratively. in the piece you're referring to, it was about concern.

JOHN PODESTA: i think if you go back and look at social media, if you look at what's going on, they are definitely pointing to mr. trump.

CHUCK TODD: so she stands by this comment?

JOHN PODESTA: she does.

CHUCK TODD: let me ask you about senator sanders and him saying he's being treated unfairly at the dnc. do you accept his apology and believe he's telling the truth?

JOHN PODESTA: i liked his apology last night better than the one i heard this morning. i think this was an egregious breach. this notion that somehow this information just kind of came into the possession of his campaign is completely inaccurate. the firewall went down, they made 25 separate searches, 24 occasions, they moved -- tried to move information into personal files that was information we had gathered, spent enormous amount of volunteer effort to put together and these were very directed searches about who our supporters were, who the people who were least likely to support us were and they got caught. and they didn't respond well to the dnc but he acknowledged that it was an error. they fired their type data guy. he wasn't a 20-year-old kid, he was a 39-year-old ph.d. that's a very senior position in the campaign. they just put two other people on suspension.

CHUCK TODD: so you don't think they're being -- you don't think he's being forthcoming?

JOHN PODESTA: this was a very serious breach. i don't think his campaign has been particularly forth coming. i think senator sanders is a good guy and i think his campaign is a little bit not serving him well in this instance. i think they were clearly -- did something that was unethical and if you look, though, at other occasions they've created a culture where senator sanders says he doesn't want to run negative ads then they run negative ads then he has to pull the negative ads. he says he doesn't want a super pac but a super pac is supporting him. so i think he has a problem in his campaign with the culture of that campaign and that was shown in this incident and i think the -- we're the victims of this, not the sanders campaign.

CHUCK TODD: all right, john podesta, campaign chair for secretary clinton, thanks for sending a little time this morning. appreciate it.

We just ended our Ignite! Conference in St. Louis, where 1,000 of our best member leaders gathered to recommit to fighting to build economic and political power for all workers!

I'm following up on our conversation on how Secretary Clinton can engage with SEIU members and non-union workers. As you know our members are putting their hearts and souls into the Fight for $15 and a union, commonsense immigration reform, delivering on the promise of ACA, Blacks Lives Matter, and voting rights for everyone.

I'm looking forward to working together to think about how we can create spaces for the Secretary to have a dialogue with our members and non-union workers, so she can hear their stories, and they can hear how she's thinking about the issues that matter to working people. Here are a few ideas:

1. April 15 -- Fight for $15 Day of Action: The movement that started with fast food workers in NYC has exploded to include Walmart workers, airport baggage handlers and passenger service attendants, home care providers, child care workers, adjunct college faculty, and other underpaid people who want to create jobs that pay people enough to actually live on. On April 15, workers will take action in a major mobilization in Chicago, Los Angeles, New York City and two hundred other cities across the globe. These workers are taking a huge risk by taking a stand and need public support in the media and at actions.

2. Workers' Roundtables: These would provide an opportunity to have a conversation with workers about the challenges they face and to test drive solutions together. For example, we could pull together a group of childcare providers and fast food workers to talk with the Secretary about the challenges of our nation's lack of affordable, accessible, and universal childcare for low-wage workers and providers.

3. "Walk a Day" with our members. Sec. Clinton spending a day with childcare, homecare or other workers would be incredibly compelling and lift up the courageous, important and difficult work that service sector workers do every day to take care of our children, elderly and the disabled.

4. Conversations with SEIU Leadership: The SEIU Executive Committee (approx. 30 local union leaders) will meet in May in Chicago, and our full International Executive Board (70 local union leaders) will meet in Detroit in June. We could also pull together any subsection of leaders based on geography, industry, or other criteria.

Here's a list of some of what's on our calendar already. We're surprisingly nimble and could add public or private events with relatively fast turnaround.

March 30 – April 3	National Week of Action for Commonsense Immigration Reform
April 15	Fight for $15 Day of Action
May 1	May Day Actions for Commonsense Immigration Reform
May TBD	SEIU Executive Committee Meeting, Chicago
May/June TBD	SCOTUS decision on King v. Burwell
June 8-12	SEIU International Executive Board Meeting, Detroit

Subject: 特偵組發言人陳雲南

特偵組發言人陳雲南

中廣新聞網 更新日期:2008/11/27 09:05

惜字如金的陳雲南

為民除害顯佛心，護法懲奸現正神。
仁民愛物服群倫，悲世慈心轉法輪。
人民慶幸得斯君，天地道規可保存。

每天以標準的短袖中山裝，早上九點準時在特偵組大門應付媒體的特偵組發言人陳雲南，由於發言簡單惜字如金，也被稱為「史上最牛發言人」，陳雲南在擔任新竹地檢署任內時，就是以簡樸著稱，就連家中有急事，他還以公用電話打回家，也讓地檢署同仁印象深刻。

特偵組發言人陳雲南調離新竹地檢署已經三年，但是隨著前總統陳水扁洗錢案，陳雲南曝光率大增，不少民眾對陳雲南的印象是準時上午九點出現在電視機前，而且身上永遠是短袖的中山裝，最令媒體頭痛的是，經常記者問的問題比陳雲南的回答的答案還要長，惜字如金的陳雲南，也稱得上是「史上最牛的發言人」。

事實上，特偵組發言人在擔任新竹地檢署檢察長任內，一年四季都是短袖的中山裝，而且辦公室從來不開冷氣，頂多開個電扇，每天清晨六點就進地檢署，因此開地檢署大門、拿報紙的工作，幾乎都是陳雲南一手包辦，陳雲南每天加班到深夜十二點以後，所有檢察官的書類，儘管各組主任檢察官已看過，但陳雲南一定會再看一遍。

令地檢署同仁印象深刻除了陳雲南嚴以律己的個性之外，就是簡樸到不行。家中有急事，陳雲南會拿著電話卡到地檢署對門的超商旁打公用電話；而地檢署同仁或是和媒體聚餐時，陳雲南座位旁並不好坐，因為所有的盤子收走時，一定是空的，只要有任何的剩菜，陳雲南一定會分完，邊分菜還回憶九二一大地震時，災民都沒有東西吃，當然坐在陳雲南旁的客人，不到三道菜就已吃飽。

陳雲南為嘉義縣人，法訓所第十七期結業，東吳法律系畢，曾任宜蘭、台中地檢署檢察官、新竹地檢署主任檢察官、台灣高檢署檢察官、主任檢察官、法務部司法官訓練所秘書、警政署政風室主任、南投、新竹地檢署檢察長，歷練完整。陳雲南自我要求高，常被拿來和前北檢檢察長黃世銘相提並論，一位檢察首長以「人格者」形容陳自律甚嚴。

陳雲南除參加婚喪喜慶、公務拜會餐敘外，從不參加私人應酬，他解釋說：「私人應酬很麻煩，最好都省了」。

檢察機關傳聞，陳雲南常在辦公室看書類到凌晨一、二點；有部屬說，他在看過的起訴書、處分書上蓋章簽名，旁邊註明的時間竟是隔天凌晨，如○○五八、○一○二等，確讓人瞠目結舌。

若干法界人士認為，陳雲南出線，可能也和他抗壓性強，全力支持檢察官有關。據指出，南投地檢偵辦前南投縣長彭百顯被控貪瀆案、竹檢偵辦聯電案時，因案件敏感，檢察官承受外界很大壓力，時任檢察長的他都全力支持檢察官依法偵辦，獲得部屬肯定。

與同期司法官相比，陳雲南年齡大了許多，主要是由於他原擔任書記官，公餘苦讀多年後才考上司法官。

陳雲南辦案風格強悍，曾偵辦過苗栗農校採購教科書貪瀆案、宜蘭縣議員審查預算貪瀆案及台中春為公司等逃漏稅

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

捐案。他在2005年新竹地檢署檢察長任內，在任期尚未屆滿即被調任法務部參事，外界質疑和竹檢偵辦聯電案時，大規模搜索前未通報法務部及檢察高層有關。

曾與陳雲南共事過的檢察官指出，陳雲南律己甚嚴，下班後外出絕不用公務車，假日外出時，只要路程不遠，他一定走路過去。平時上班，陳雲南也以捷運代步，即使如此，他到特偵組之後，每天都是最早到的檢察官，也會等到所有檢察官都下班後才會離去。

有一次，特偵組檢察官因水利工程弊案訊問經濟部次長侯和雄到凌晨五時，陳雲南也奉陪到底，當時他還不忘照顧在外苦苦守候的媒體，指派法警購買早餐供記者享用。

另外，平時不論天氣多冷，陳雲南多半身著短袖青年裝。陳雲南說，不怕冷和從小家境清苦有關，也因此養成勤儉的習慣，十多年前他放熱水洗澡，總感覺要把前面那一段冷水放掉很可惜，後來乾脆都洗冷水澡。

接任特偵組主任之後，陳雲南恪守本分，協調檢察官辦案及辦理草創之初的各種行政事務。在檢察總長陳聰明不直接與媒體接觸後，還得直接面對社會輿論的種種意見。儘管如此，他還是以「長官交代的事情一定要努力達成」簡單帶過。

兼任特偵組發言人的角色，與陳雲南原本低調、口風緊的個性不相符合，但他還是盡力扮演好自己角色，並多次與陳聰明、檢察官及媒體協調。一位特偵組檢察官指出，陳雲南曾兩度向陳聰明請辭，但均獲慰留，他也繼續挺直腰桿，擔任特偵組與媒體間的橋樑工作。

陳雲南常說：「作為一個公務員，就要做好自己的工作」。陳雲南恪遵這個簡單的道理，在三十多年的公職生涯中受到外界一致肯定，期盼讓特偵組這隻「初生之犢」成長茁壯，繼續擔任打虎的工作。

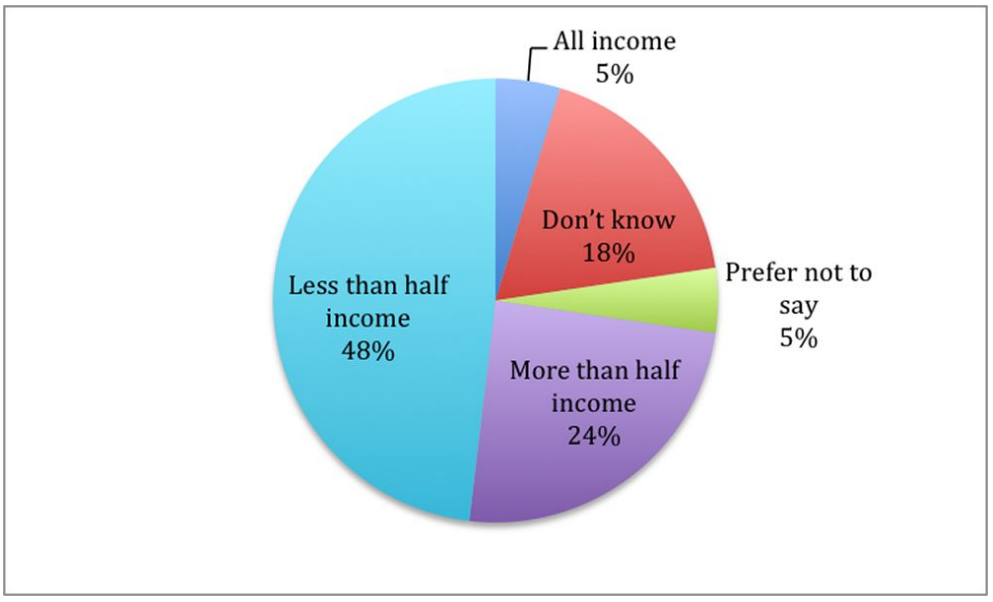
Progressive European research finds: around five million crowd workers in the uk 'gig economy'



Joint study by the Foundation for European Progressive Studies (FEPS) and UNI Europa, carried out by University of Hertfordshire, with fieldwork by Ipsos MORI, indicates the true size of the UK's 'gig economy'. The findings have prompted calls for further research into the impact on workers' rights, consumer protection, public health and tax revenues.

It is known by many different names: 'gig economy', 'sharing economy', 'crowd working', 'platform capitalism' and even 'uberisation'. But one thing is clear: we are witnessing a phenomenal growth in new forms of work organised via online platforms. Up to now there has been little accurate information about its extent in the UK but, according to the latest research into the scale of this far-reaching change to national work culture, around 11% of online adults aged 16-75, equivalent to five million people, are being paid for work through online platforms like Upwork, Uber and TaskRabbit.

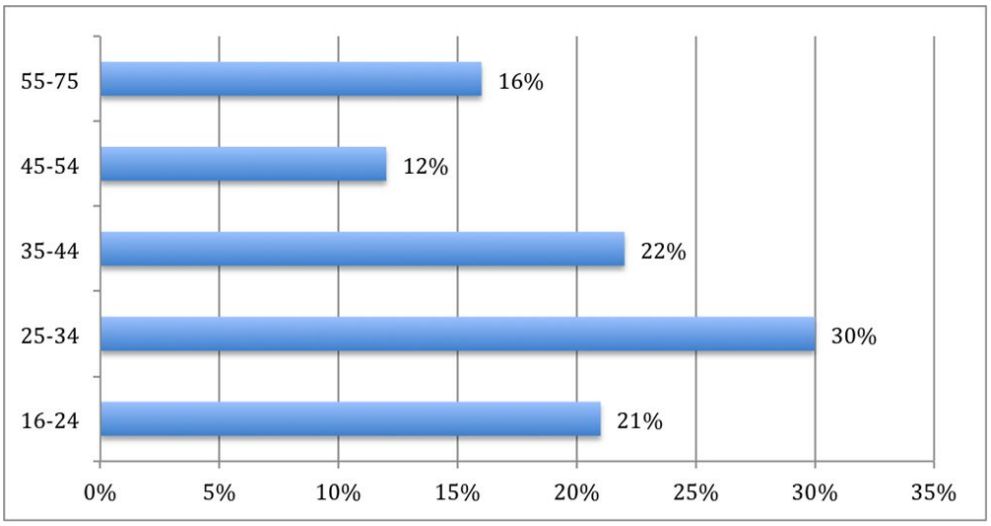
Main source of work or a supplement to a main job?



It is often thought the gig economy is used either for altruistic reasons or as an occasional income top-up in addition to another main job. In fact, for a substantial proportion of UK crowd workers, it is the only or main source of income. As graphic shows, over a quarter of those willing to divulge this information say they rely on this income as their sole or main source of income.

Who are the crowd workers?

Women are somewhat more likely than men to be crowd workers, with 54% of the crowd workforce female and 46% male.
Crowd workers are generally young, with just over half (51%) under the age of 35. Nevertheless, around one crowd worker in six (16%) is over 55 showing that age is no barrier to participating in the gig economy.
It is often thought that most crowd workers are students. This is not the case. Only 10% of those actually doing crowd work in the sample were students, a proportion that dropped to 6% among those doing crowd work at least weekly. This is in line with the general proportion of students in the adult population of the UK (at around 8%).

Upcoming Book on Digital employment and working conditions in Europe

The book to be released by mid-March focuses on the social and political issues caused by the digital revolution which is currently in the making. The specific aspects of that societal change is the new “platform economy” featuring “crowdsourcing” of enterprises and its related pendant “crowdworking” which were enabled by the internet. Currently, crowdworking is probably a small but rapidly growing segment of the workforce. In this context, digital employment and working conditions are put in relation to the Digital Single Market Agenda, launched last yeard by the European Commission.

Edited by FEPS and UNI Europa. Among the contributors: Jutta Steinrück (MPE, S&D Rapporteur in Employment committee on digital), Kristy Milland (community manager of TurkerNation), Veronika Wasza (marketing and PR manager at Testbirds), Allan Mayo (smart cities strategist at Digital Greenwich), and Oliver Röthig (regional secretary of UNI Europa) and more….

Testimony from a click worker

Kristy Milland, Community manager of TurkerNation.com

"Upon waking, I look at my phone. No messages, so I turn on my laptop and get it looking for some work. As I brush my teeth, an alarm goes off, and I rush back, toothbrush hanging from my mouth, to write some titles for porn videos. Once the 10,000 pieces of work are complete, I return to the bathroom. Next I grab my laptop and head to the kitchen to get breakfast, but before I can crack an egg the alarm goes off again. This time it is a survey that takes me over an hour, but when I get to the last page it tells me I don't qualify and that I won't be paid for what I had done up to that point. Infuriated, I head to Turkopticon, a site where workers can rate people who post work on Amazon Mechanical Turk, to warn others, but by now there are already over a dozen other comments from people who have already faced the same issue. After this I make breakfast, sit down, and watch for any work that might come through. I need $100 today to pay the rent, buy some groceries, and pay for my daughter's school trip, but I'm not sure I'm going to get it. By bedtime, after being at my computer for over 12 hours, I only have $20. Tomorrow I'll have to work extra hard, or maybe skip breakfast, or I might not make the rent".

This quote is part of the chapter written by Kristy Milland in the above mentioned book on Digital employment and working conditions in Europe. Read the full chapter .

Muscatine, IA

Ropeline

He signed a sax for a nice high schooler, which folks seemed to go nuts over. Other than that no issues on the ropeline.

Created some contrast with Sanders:

Said congress won't pass free education. And used some of the same language from earlier today.

WJC just said that it's fine to say you're for a single payer system. He acknowledged that if we didn't have something to build on, maybe it's what we should be doing. But, that we can't afford to rip away the progress we've made - that we need to build on what we have.

He made the same Wall St. argument/contrast he did earlier today. He also used the bit on Bernie calling Planned Parenthood on others the establishment. Adlibbed a bit this time saying that just because people aren't for sure doesn't mean that they're the establishment.

Said people who can afford to pay for their children's education (i.e.: him) should not get it for free. That everyone should contribute their fair share. That it'd unfair to take away money from those who need it.

Said the 90's were good, but that we need to upgrade that to get similar results in new and challenging times.

Fun fact: As it turns out, and per WJC, watermelons aren't very good when they're north of 40 lbs - because they're mostly water. He offered as much after reminding the crowd here that the world record for watermelons stood at some 270 lbs, at one point. And, that it was grown in AR while he was Governor.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Remarks

About 350 more Iowans showed up to see WJC here in Muscatine.

The field organizer (Fernando) that introduced WJC was pretty good.

WJC shared a fun little story about watermelons & acknowledged that delicious wine is made in Muscatine.

Piggybacking off of what Fernando said during his intro, WJC started by talking CHIP and health care.

He transitioned and shared a couple of the stories of the folks he's met while out here.

He then spent some time framing the election and laying out what's at stake. Covered college affordability, ISIS, immigration, trickle down economics (we did it before, we can do it again), community-police relations, voting rights, and gun safety.

Had some fun with the GOP, saying they "name and blame." Used his cold/Obama line. And said they've now resorted to blame HRC.

He created some contrast with Bernie. (Insert language above).

Closed by delivering all of the biographical points.

But, said we need real answers to real problems. That it may not be emotionally satisfying, but that it's the truth. And went on to articulate HRC's colleague affordability plan.

Said that he and Obama are the only two Presidents since Eisenhower to have Republican Sec.'s of Defense.

Said America's approval rating went up 20 percent while she was SoS.

Remarks

350 deep here in Fairfield.

WJC was fired up

Said he saw the strength and diversity of America yesterday while traveling throw IA. He shared the stories of some of the folks he's met since being here, covering the issues of health care, prescription drug abuse, and immigration. Said he was telling these stories because the election was about them (the people).

He then dove into articulating what's at stake these elections.

Said most folks are angry because change hasn't caught up to them yet.

Said it isn't close. HRC's the best change-maker.

(Insert all of the Bernie language).

Covered the economy and said we need to recapture the American Dream. Brought out his charts, compared and contrasted his performance with Reagan's, and said only one person can get us back on track.

Covered ISIS, Muslims, and the GOP's fear-mongering.

Said the doesn't want to run against her, so they're constantly attacking her. And, went on to offer all of the biographical points he's been making.

Closed with his bit on Flint.

Making the point that income inequality has been something he's both cared about and has credibility on, WJC said he's probably given more speeches about income inequality than anyone currently running for office.

Offered this fun fact: Turkey's can see better than humans.

Said we need answers over angers. Hope over fear. And action over rhetoric. Said HRC is the only one equipped to help us achieve all of that.

Made some contrast on health care.

Said he's tickled that she's tagged as part of the establishment. That her opponent calls Planned Parenthood the establishment. And then went on to use his language on HRC going to Wall St. to call them out.

Remarks

Started by effectively articulating what's at stake & why people are apprehensive about the future. Said we need to finish the recovery started under Obama and that we need to bring back the middle class.

Said we can do it because we've done it before. (pulled out his charts and gave Reagan the business).

Said we shouldn't turn our backs on important issues or turn Muslims into demons. That we should be doing this together.

Covered BLM, immigration, prescription and heroin drub abuse, dark money in politics, and voting rights.

Said that while it's important not to let the GOP not to rip away all the progress we've made, we need to work together - that we need more friends and fewer enemies.

He then moved on to the issue of guns, which he fleshed out a little bit. And then ISIS. And the frustration folks are feeling.

After he made the turn, he spent a significant chunk of time on all of the good things HRC has made happen - as a private citizen, as a Sen., and as SoS.

Covered health care.

And, the sanction on Iran. He praised HRC's effort profusely and suggested that both Obama and Kerry have acknowledged how important they've been.

And, Wall St. (Insert color).

Closed by saying we don't have time to start over and try and get things done. Said we need someone who want to continue to build on the success achieved. That we need a change-maker. That we need HRC.

I thought this was one of the most focused of all of the cases he's made on behalf of HRC. Will send the transcript when I have it.

Ropeline

Was asked by NBC how he feels going into the home stretch. He said he feels good. That folks are being receptive. That he's made the case he's wanted to make and that HRC has worked hard. That all that's left now is to leave it all on the floor.

Color | New | Flags

Said that he is indeed mad about all of the problems we're facing (i.e.: college affordability and kids being crippled by debt), but that ultimately what we need a change- maker. And that said change-maker is HRC.

Remarks

WJC was pretty fired up here in Washington, where WJC addressed 300 people, which I'm told is a pretty decent-sized crowd.

He started by arguing that we can't afford not to elect HRC, because she would lead with more friends and fewer enemies.

Talked about HRC's toughness, using the 11-hour Benghazi hearing as an example.

Forcefully pointed out that she's the only candidate to have gone to Wall St. to warn that if they didn't cut it out with home mortgage securities that they'd drive the economy into a ditch.

Pointed out the HRC's best friend from Chicago and dozens of people from AR are here knocking doors on her behalf, that it should tell you all you need to know. That she's isn't anything like the caricature that the GOP likes to paint.

He then dedicated a chunk of time speaking about all of HRC's accomplishments a private citizen, as a Senator from NY, and as SoS.

He also created a bit of contracts on health care, but stuck to what he's been saying this whole time.

Said she would make good things happen on the good days (i.e.: when he reversed trickle down economics or signed peace in Ireland), on the bad days (i.e.: the day President Obama must've had after San Bernardino), and also on the other days.

He closed by talking about Flint.

Was asked by the student newspaper to articulate some of the foreign policy differences between HRC and Sanders. WJC didn’t take the bait and instead opted to talk about all that HRC did around Iran and the sanctions.

Was also asked by a Norwegian reporter what it would take to win on Monday. WJC said “for folks to show up.”

Color | New | Flag

Said we dont have shared prosperity and that the American Dream isn’t exactly alive for everybody. That job #1 for the next POTUS will be to restore broad-based prosperity.

Said the GOP can’t kill or occupy or bomb everyone to the stone age.

Brought his charts out again. Seemed to work better here, with WJC drawing a few laughs.

Covered health care a little bit, making the practical argument about not having 60 votes in the Senate. Said that he believes that the Republican Governors that haven’t taken the MedicAid Expansion money will eventually do so, because it creates jobs. Didn’t mention Sanders by name, FYI.

Said that the success of a President depends on what your positions are and what you know, but that it also depends on what you can do and whether or not you can work with others — that there’s a difference between a change-talker and a change-maker.

Said that his sick of all this cynicism and all of the yelling, because it has nothing to do with people. That if folks are sick of it too, they should support a change-maker. And, that’s HRC.

Remarks

WJC started by articulating what’s at stake, and why we can’t afford to let Republicans reverse everything that Pres. Obama has accomplished.

In framing what’s at stake, he used climate change, voting rights, immigration, ISIS, and the economy under him (VS Reagan) as examples.

He then went on to talk about some of HRC’s plans and positions, particularly health care and drug abuse. (Insert contrast language).

Had a little fun with the GOP, reminding folks about their 3D strategy. And, how they like to blame others for all of our problems, mainly Mexicans, Muslims, and President Obama and HRC.

He closed strongly saying we need a change-maker and not a change-talker (insert change-maker language), and dove into all of the things HRC has done as a private citizen, as a Senator from NY, and as SoS.

He asked what it meant that Michael Whouley is with him in IA. WJC said that he helps with keeping his head in a good space.

Mark followed up and asked what Whouley being here meant for HRC. WJC said that hopefully it meant good things because like HRC all that Whouley has touched he's made better.

He said trickle down economics is a failure and we can't go back. (He held up his graphs!).

Argued that we shouldn't resent success, but that we should rather move forward together.

Said it's slightly crazy that you only need to be 14 years old in IA to have a gun permit.

Said Liberal Republicans don't exist anymore.

Joked that he stared at HRC for several weeks before they actually met.

Remarks

Started by framing the election and articulating what's at stake. He also talked about America's potential.

He then covered clean energy, gun safety, voting rights, inclusive politics, and the Benghazi Committee.

He transitioned and made all of the biographical points he's been making, forcefully arguing that HRC has been a change maker her whole life.

He closed by making his Flint argument & by making the same points he made last night re her faith.

BILL CLINTON: Everything she ever touched, she made better, I'm just telling you, including me. It's like just second nature and it's why a lot of these people, they don't really know how to deal with her or cover her or anything, you know. But it's evident.

QUESTION: Do you think we're covering her wrong?
BILL CLINTON: I'll tell you another example. Her best friends from childhood are coming down here, I think starting tomorrow from Chicago to canvass for her. She hasn't lived in Arkansas since [inaudible] January? 90 of them almost, 89 are going to New Hampshire, just getting four days going door to door.

At their own expense and a lot of them can't afford the trip. But they're doing it because they know her and they believe in her and they have got [inaudible] personal stories of how she made a difference and what kind of person she was.

And that's all that matters. The rest of the stuff--

QUESTION: Do you think the general public knows the real Hillary?
BILL CLINTON: What?

QUESTION: Do you think the general public knows the real Hillary?

BILL CLINTON: I think they're getting to know it, I think seeing their -- I think seeing the debates helped. I think seeing her go through that 11 hours helped. Remember what that guy in the CNN Town Hall meeting? He said, "I was a lukewarm supporter of yours." He said, "I saw that 11 hours. I am done [inaudible]. Nobody else in America could have done that."

QUESTION: Do you think that [inaudible]?

BILL CLINTON: I think it helped.

BILL CLINTON: But I think it all helps. I think the more people see her, [inaudible] they'll know what she cares about. But I think having her friends out there helps.

QUESTION: Do you think that Benghazi testimony was the strongest moment of her campaign?

BILL CLINTON: No, I think she's had a lot of strong moments.

QUESTION: Senator Sanders has gone after your wife for holding a fundraiser tonight. What's your response to that?

She spends enough time in Iowa?

BILL CLINTON: I think the far more important thing is before this economy cratered, she's the only person running for president in either party who went to Wall Street and said "You guys are dragging the economy in the ditch. You'd better change."

QUESTION: Do you think [inaudible]?

BILL CLINTON: Thank you. What?

QUESTION: Are you surprised Bernie Sanders isn't gung ho about a debate in New Hampshire?

BILL CLINTON: I don't know. I haven't thought about it. I think she said she'd do it if everybody showed up. I think debates are good for people, because they flesh out, you get to hear people talk about why they propose to do certain things.
And I personally think she's right about the healthcare thing, based on my experience. I have a -- nobody ever even got a healthcare bill for universal coverage out of committee from Harry Truman to me. But we got it out of two committees.

[Inaudible] situation. [Inaudible] when the Affordable Care Act passed. I was doing handstands of ecstacy [inaudible]. It's a lot easier to from 90 to 100 than from zero to 100 through 60 votes in the Senate and the House has voted 60 times to repeal it.
So I think the debates, though, they let you answer whatever questions people have, whatever they have. The public decides what they think is relevant.

QUESTION: [Inaudible] pie in the sky, that it just isn't possible. Is she angry enough to win in an election that we've seen where anger really has paid off?

BILL CLINTON: What?

QUESTION: Donald Trump is pretty angry. He's resonating with voters. Is she angry enough to win [inaudible]?

BILL CLINTON: It's important, if you're in this position, to have no feelings about that except you're trying to help people. She's angry that so many Americans have not participated in the recovery, have had their own potential and their [inaudible], their children [inaudible].

She's angry that we haven't done anything for these areas that have been left out and left behind, like Coal Country. She's angry that we haven't done enough to help people in this prescription drug and opiate epidemic. She just thinks about -- it's like when she called the Mayor in Flint: "What can I do to help?" That's what drives her.

What I said tonight is exactly who she's been for ever since the first day I met her. Do all the good you can. Her instinct is not who can I attack, who can I blame? It's not that you shouldn't ask people to take responsibility when they make mistakes, but her immediate instinct is what can I do to make it better. And that's what we need right now.

QUESTION: President Clinton, when you think about the general election map if Donald Trump blows this thing out and it's a Hillary Clinton match against Trump, what should voters be thinking about this week in terms of what Bernie Sanders' candidacy would look like up against Donald Trump versus your wife?

BILL CLINTON: I don't think like that. I think what voters should be thinking about this week is who is most likely to make my life, my children and grandchildren's lives and this country a place of shared prosperity, a force of security and peace and a place where we come together around solving our common social problems like [inaudible]. Who would be better?

QUESTION: But do you--

BILL CLINTON: The politics will take care of itself if people make the right decision about who's the most likely to have a positive impact.

QUESTION: And do you think the conventional wisdom will matter here for Donald Trump. I mean, if you've got Cruz who's got a better ground game, but Trump's got five million Twitter followers?

BILL CLINTON: I have no idea. I have no idea. It depends on whether it's an evidence-free or an evidence-matters election. It depends on whether people vote for someone who has a real chance to help them make their lives better. Those things are imponderable.

Anger can be a good thing, properly channeled. Apprehensiveness can be a good thing, properly channeled. It depends on how it shakes out. All we can do, all she can do is be who she is, who she's been all her life. I think it will be in the end what the American people want.

QUESTION: Do you think those people who are really angry -- do you see an opportunity for a crossover between a Clinton and a Trump voter?

BILL CLINTON: Well, I think first of all she's the very first person to say, "Hey I know they vote Republican. We ought to do something for Coal Country." We have not done a good job in America in dealing with the areas that get hurt from globalization or from the rise of climate change or anything else.

Coal employment in American peaked 95 years ago. It's not like we just learned about this. Thousands of jobs were lost when President Bush, ostensibly a pro-coal president was in office because he couldn't stop the rise of natural gas.

QUESTION: Yes.

BILL CLINTON: And so look, I think there's an opportunity for everybody to get votes everywhere if you run a people-centered campaign and you trust people to think. You've got to really trust people. You've got to say, "There's a lot of stuff you've got to let go."

There's a lot of stuff you've got to step away from. If you run a people-centered campaign that's future oriented, I think there's opportunity everywhere.

WJC opened his speech by saying that HRC was in Adele earlier today. And that soon enough folks here will have the entire family in the state. He joked that Charlotte will be the difference-maker this election. That she can persuade him to do anything.

Recycled his 3Ds line & joked that you almost have to admire the GOP, because what's a fact here and there - that they live in a fact-free world.

Said we can't allow for the perfect to be the enemy of the good, that HRC will get the show on the road. That there's only one person who's a proven change maker on hostile territory and that's really important.

Reiterated that every single attempt to pass health care has always required 60 votes. That he and HRC were the first to do so. And that yeah they weren't successful, but that she ultimately got CHIP with Kennedy.

Said Newt told him that HRC was brilliant in the senate.

Said we have to deal with what we've got, i.e.: sixty Republicans in Congress.

Used his Flint bit, which got noticed.

References the Obama interview, saying he said that she's ready to be President.

Remarks

He started by covering a couple of issues, including climate change and immigration.

He then had a bit of fun with the GOP, saying that they're masters at labeling and blaming. (Insert 3Ds line).

Followed that up by making a lot of the biographical points he's been making on the trail. He talked about her time as a public citizen (insert health care line), as a Senator from NY, and as SoS.

Covered the economy: asked rhetorically: You don't mind if Warren Buffet makes money if he creates jobs, don't you?; and made the case why HRC will make the economy work for ever American again. He also said she's the only person running for President that went to Wall St. to speak against speculation.

Talked Flint. (Used his usual line).

Closed pretty strongly by saying she's the best change maker he's met. (Insert Obama line).

Media Matters Action Network Launches SmearBuster.org

Rabin-Havt: "Fox News is legitimizing and spreading the paranoia of the lunatic fringe."

WASHINGTON, D.C. – Media Matters Action Network announced the launch of SmearBuster.org , a new website fighting back against the right-wing smear machine's progressive witch hunt. Oozing with desperation, conservatives in the media and on Capitol Hill have resorted to spouting fringe-inspired lies and paranoid conspiracy theories in their ongoing vendetta against high-profile progressives.

Conservatives have launched a war against progressives such as Cass Sunstein, Carol Browner, Mark Lloyd, John Holdren and Van Jones. Through SmearBuster.org , Media Matters Action Network will expose the false smears spread by conservatives attempting to halt progressive change.

"Fox News is legitimizing and spreading the paranoia of the lunatic fringe," Media Matters Action Network Managing Director Ari Rabin-Havt said. "Our mission is to confront misinformation at its source; and more often than not, the source is Glenn Beck."

A prosperous America requires a well-informed population participating in the democratic process, not a citizenry paralyzed with the fear instilled in them by egomaniacal television personalities and radio hosts.

"Glenn Beck's Fox News and his minions are targeting high-profile progressives. SmearBuster.org will fight back against their preposterous lies," Rabin-Havt added.

Earlier this month, Media Matters Action Network launched EmailChecker.org to counter conservative misinformation gone viral. EmailChecker.org provides users with ready-made responses to the most common and most egregious email smears.

Media Matters Action Network is a Web-based, not-for-profit, progressive action and information center dedicated to comprehensively monitoring, analyzing, and correcting conservative misinformation.

Good morning,

I hope you are both enjoying the long weekend. For my paper topic, I would like to write about the Senate and House hearings on the U.S. Attorney firings in 2007, and specifically the contempt of congress charges against Miers and Bolton by the House of Representatives. I would like to compare it to the more recent contempt of congress charges by the House against Eric Holder and Lois Lerner. I became interested in the topic because in his book, Government by Investigation, Paul C. Light categorizes the US Attorney firing scandal investigations as "lightweight," and without much impact, in part because the investigations became so divided along partisan lines. This paper topic may overlap in part with the question about executive privilege, but I don't intend to examine it in my paper. Please let me know if you have any thoughts or suggestions for this topic.

A Brief Guide to Brief Writing: Demystifying The Memorandum of Law

Briefs are strange hybrid creatures, a combination of legal reasoning and good storytelling. You need to be able to construct a persuasive legal argument in support of a client's case while telling your client's story.

A Brief Guide to Brief Writing is the third in a series of practice guides by experienced litigator, Janet Kole. Covering topics that include ethical principles, lower court/appellate court distinctions, and JDAs, the author's honest and direct guidelines will help shape the brief writing of both veteran and new attorneys. Her lively instructions on the craft of writing are summarized in seven Persuasive Writing Rules of Thumb:

- Grab the reader with your best, most equitable reason for why your client should win.
- Use acceptable but informal formal language.
- Use plain, jargon-free language.
- Use metaphors, allegory, and shorthand phrases very sparingly.
- Keep your sentences and paragraphs short.
- Use active voice where possible.
- Show the court that your story is the best, don't tell the court that it is.

Subject: LCV participants on Wednesday

1. Carol Browner, Chair, LCV Board of Directors
Carol Browner is Senior Counselor at Albright Stonebridge Group and a Distinguished Senior Fellow at the Center for American Progress. Ms. Browner most recently served as Assistant to President Obama and director of the White House Office of Energy and Climate Change Policy, as the Administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency from 1993 to 2001, and as Secretary of Environmental Regulation in Florida from 1991 to 1993.

2. Kathleen Welch, Chair, LCV Board Political and Campaign Committee
A principal at Corridor Partners, Kathleen Welch brings three decades of advocacy, campaigns, and philanthropic experience, holding leadership positions in state and national groups, the Legal Services Corporation, and as executive director of Equal Justice Works. Kathleen served in senior roles at The Pew Charitable Trusts, including as deputy director of the Environment Group.

3. Brendon Cechovic, LCV Board of Directors, Political and Campaigns Committee
Brendon is the Executive Director of the Western Conservation Foundation, and previously served as Executive Director of Washington Conservation Voters, LCV's state partner organization.

4. Pete Maysmith, LCV Board of Directors, Political and Campaigns Committee
Pete is the Executive Director of Conservation Colorado, LCV's state partner organization. For the last 24 years, Pete has done on-the-ground organizing, run state and national field campaigns, lobbied at the city, state, and national level, done extensive earned media work, directed statewide candidate and ballot campaigns, run a statewide non-profit, and served as senior leadership staff of national organizations.

5. Bill Roberts, LCV Board of Directors, Political and Campaigns Committee
A principal at Corridor Partners, Bill Roberts has over 30 years of experience in politics, advocacy, and philanthropy, having held leadership positions at Atlantic Philanthropies (director of U.S. advocacy) and the Beldon Fund (president). In advocacy and policy, Bill held senior positions on the U.S. House Energy and Commerce Committee and at the Environmental Defense Fund.

6. Kerry Schumann, LCV Board of Directors, Political and Campaigns Committee
Kerry has served as the Executive Director of Wisconsin League of Conservation Voters, LCV's state partner organization, since 2004, rapidly taking it form a two person start-up to a political force in the state. A native of Wisconsin, Kerry has over 20 years experience leading Wisconsin conservation organizations.

7. Wesley Warren, Political and Campaigns Committee
Wesley recently retired after many years as the Director of Policy Advocacy at the Natural Resources Defense Council (NRDC) and NRDC Action Fund, where he developed and execute major issue campaigns. Prior to joining NRDC, Wesley served as Associate Director for Natural Resources, Energy and Science in the Office of Management and Budget during President Clinton's administration, as chief of staff for the Council on Environmental Quality, executive director of the White House Task Force on Livable Communities, and as a legislative aide for U.S. Representative Claudine Schneider (R-RI) and U.S. Representative Philip Sharp (D-IN).

8. Gene Karpinski, President, LCV
Gene joined LCV in April 2006 after serving for more than a dozen years as a member of the LCV and LCVEF Boards of Directors and the LCV Political Committee. Under Gene's leadership, LCV has played a lead role in the environmental community's efforts to pass clean energy and climate policies and LCV's electoral budget has more than tripled since 2006. Prior to joining LCV, Gene worked for 21 years as the Executive Director of the U.S. Public Interest Research Group (U.S. PIRG).

9. Tiernan Sittenfeld, Senior Vice President of Government Affairs, LCV
Tiernan directs LCV's policy and lobbying efforts with Congress and the Obama administration on a range of issues, works on LCV's legislative accountability campaigns and oversees the National Environmental Scorecard. Before joining LCV in April 2005, she worked for the U.S. Public Interest Research Group (U.S. PIRG) as the Preservation Advocate and Co-Director of the Heritage Forests Campaign. She previously worked as the Field Director for Oregon State PIRG and as a Campus Organizer with California PIRG at UC-Davis and UCLA.

10. Craig Auster, PAC & Advocacy Partnerships Director, LCV
Craig joined LCV in August 2014 after working in the political and development departments at USAction and Fair Share. Craig has experience as campaign manager and finance director on local, state, and federal campaigns, including serving as the finance director for Congresswoman Terri Sewell's upset victory in 2010 to become Alabama's first African American Congresswoman.

Joining Via Phone:

11. Michael Kieschnick, LCV Board of Directors, Political and Campaigns Committee
Michael is the former CEO, president and co-founder of CREDO/Working Assets, a company dedicated to changing the world through progressive philanthropy and political activism. Michael teaches a course on social innovation at Stanford University, and previously taught a graduate seminar on financial innovation at the University of California, Berkeley. He currently serves as a board member for several nonprofits and helps run the Secretary of State Project.

12. Bill Meadows, LCV Board of Directors, Political and Campaigns Committee
Bill served as President of The Wilderness Society from December, 1996 to May, 2012. He currently serves as an honorary member of the Governing Council and as Counselor, a senior program advisor for The Wilderness Society. Before becoming president of The Wilderness Society, he worked for the Sierra Club and as Vice President for College Relations at Sweet Briar College in Virginia.

Huge thanks from LCV!

LCV Statement on Keystone Veto

WASHINGTON, DC – League of Conservation Voters (LCV) President of Gene Karpinski released this statement on the President's veto of the Keystone XL Pipeline bill:

"We're thrilled that President Obama has taken the very important step of vetoing the bill to approve the dirty and dangerous Keystone XL tar sands pipeline. This veto, along with the president's increasing public skepticism about Keystone XL, and his incredible leadership on a wide range of environmental issues, including climate change, renewable energy, clean water, national monuments, and the Arctic Refuge, makes us more confident than ever that the president will reject the permit itself once and for all.

"According to LCV's recent poll , the American people overwhelmingly believe that if the president decides to reject the permit for Keystone XL, Congress should respect his decision and move on to other pressing issues. As the president put it so well in his State of the Union address, 'We must set our sights higher than a single pipeline.' We couldn't agree more and hope the Republican leadership will come to its senses and get serious about a clean energy future."

A suggestion on how to announce the TIGR group, assuming the policy groups are announced: Release a working group with four subgroups --

Technology & Innovation Working Group
- Innovation & Government subgroup
- Innovation & National Policy Priorities subgroup
- Innovation & Science subgroup
- Innovation & Civil Society subgroup.

Blair Levin is leader of the overall group. About five people in each subgroup.

We could announce the overall group, group leader, and names of subgroups. Names of subgroup members would go online later. All presumably in conjunction w/ other policy groups.

In this approach we'd probably suggest renaming the Technology, Innovation & Government Reform group to the Technology & Innovation group.

Advantages:
- Positive from a message standpoint.
  - Would send a signal that the transition is taking tech & innovation seriously in key specified areas.
  - Makes it easier to understand the group mission
- Helps us put together a diverse group.

Spoke w/ Dan Pfeiffer, who likes it from a communications perspective.

Chart attached shows how the group/subgroups might look. Names are not locked.

I'll show you the chart at the staff meeting tomorrow morning.

Hi Chief:

Here are the details on the CDA event at which Carol will be honored.

When: Thursday, June 19th
VIP Reception: 6:30 to 7 pm
Doors open: 7 pm
Location: Mott House, 122 Maryland Ave, NE, Washington, DC
Honorees: Carol Browner, Mario Bronfman (Ford Foundation) and Wynn Segall (Akin-Gump)

I got back from the West Coast yesterday. Erika and I went snow-shoeing in Alberta, saw Jesse for dinner in Portland on his birthday, and overall had a great time. I hope all with you and Mary are well. Congratulations on release of the climate report.

Best, D2

Hi Chief, I hope you and Mary are well. On Wednesday morning, I am flying off to the West Coast to meet Erika as she closes out of UBC. Before leaving, I wanted you to know that Carol has agreed to be honored by the NGO that hosted our trip, the Center for Democracy in the Americas, at CDA's annual event on June 19th. If you and Mary are interested in attending, I will send along details. Carol has really been great to us since coming back from Cuba – she didn't check the box and move along – and I thought you might like to be there to raise a mojito in her honor if you're free and so inclined. All the best, D2

Dear John,

Attached is a document we will refer to in the August 17 ClimateWorks board call. There is no need for you to look at this document before August 17 — we'll include this same narrative in the forthcoming board packet, and discuss it in our September 9 board meeting. Please don't share this attachment with anyone: it is written for very limited distribution to close partners. Thank you. The attachment is password-protected. The password is FTDOC082015.

The primary audience for this document is the ClimateWorks Funders Table. We deliberately do not name any specific Funders Table participants (other than ClimateWorks) in the document — the composition of the Funders Table is something we can cover in the orientation call we have scheduled for August 28. Funders Table participants are individuals that represent a dozen of the biggest foundations supporting climate mitigation efforts today.

If you have questions or comments, please don't hesitate to call or email.

Subject:	good luck and congratulations

Dear John, On the unwarranted assumption that time lies easy on your hands, I am taking the liberty of imposing on you another letter on the economy. First, re Tim Geithner - It seems likely that, with some hiccups, he will be confirmed. However, it now seems clear, for reasons of which you are undoubtedly far more aware than I am, that his failure to pay his taxes cannot be dismissed as simply an oversight. At the golf club and in the corporate world these are, at best, perceived as minor transgressions, but in the highest levels of the financial community, where reputation is the bedrock on which one's ability to function rests, they are perceived rather differently. My concern is that the Geithner "currency" in his dealings with the G5,G7,G8,G20,BIS and, most importantly, the career professionals at the Treasury has been tarnished. However brilliant his ideas and however well he presents them, he cannot escape the stigma of having cheated on his taxes, hence his ability to inspire confidence is sadly diminished. The global economic crisis is at heart a perception that asset valuations are wildly over-stated, whether it be those carried on the balance sheets of Citigroup and Merrill, the shares of GM or Mr. and Mrs. Smith's house in Queens, and no recovery is possible until that perception is changed. Through monetary and fiscal policy the central banks and finance ministries of the world are attempting to address this by subsidizing the devaluation. The difficulty with this approach, necessary though it is, is that the more money thrown at the problem the more perceptions as to true value decrease and the currency employed becomes debased (not a problem for the U.S.yet as we remain the world's reserve currency, but just look at the pound, the euro and the ruble). The other method of addressing the problem is to raise people's perception of value by the restoration of confidence in the system. I believe Harold passed on to you Prof. King's (Governor of the Bank of England) comment to me that the single most important thing the President-elect could do for the global economy would be to appoint Paul Volcker as Secretary of the Treasury. I did not know at the time, and am breaking a confidence in revealing it, but Paul had received a letter from Carlo Ciampi, former Minister of Finance and head of the Central Bank of Italy which read, in its entirety, as follows "Dear Paul, We Trust You. Carlo". The position of Secretary of the Treasury is now filled but, surely, there is a way for the President to make the world aware that Paul is playing a key role in developing the response of the United States to the global economic crisis. Restoration of confidence is far less costly and far less politically controversial than a bailout but, of course, both are needed. On a far lighter note, I gather that Steve Rattner is likely to be the "car czar."As he is one of the most unpopular people on Wall Street (number 2 in my Pantheon, a distant second, but nonetheless second, to Bruce Wasserstein) the prospect that between the unions, the managment, the shareholders and Nancy Pelosi we will be treated to a 21st Century version of that delightful medieval custom of drawing and quartering will give pleasure to many. With deep felt congratulations for the magnificent job you and your colleagues have done in handling the transition and best wishes as always, Bob

Subject:	[big campaign] The irony - AHIP warns of a "Government Monopoly Over Your Healthcare" in email blast

Up is down and the sky in green in the big health insurance industry's world, saying anything and everything to kill reform. Check out the laughable subject line in the email blast below paid for by America's Health Insurance Plans (AHIP), the health insurance lobby:

"Fwd: Say "NO" to a Government Monopoly Over Your Healthcare"

That is funny – albeit patently absurd -- stuff coming from an industry that enjoys a virtual monopoly in 94 percent of the markets in the United States. This is the same industry that has exploited its exemption from anti-trust laws for decades by crowding out competition and gouging American consumers to death. Without real competition, the big insurance companies that AHIP represent routinely deny coverage to millions of people with "pre-existing conditions," rescind policies when people get seriously ill, and jack up premiums three times faster than wages – all done to maximize industry profits and compensate its CEO's tens of millions of dollars. Contrary to AHIP's hysterical claim, the health insurance reform proposals soon to be taken up in Congress will inject real competition into the insurance marketplace and finally provide all Americans access to quality, affordable health care by repealing the insurance industry's baffling anti-trust exemption and establishing a public health insurance option. What will AHIP say next to maintain the status quo?

See below video Americans United for Change released last week on the subject, titled, what else: "Monopoly."

Dear Jason,

Last week, House Speaker Nancy Pelosi (D-CA) unveiled the merged "Tri-Committee" healthcare reform bill, the "Affordable Health Care for America Act" (HR 3962), which is expected to be considered by the full House late this week. While we applaud Congress' continuing efforts to pass much-needed reform legislation this year, we are very disappointed that this merged House bill would create a new government-run health plan.

A government-run health plan will only create more problems, not solve the ones we have. Tell Congress to Get Health Reform Right and protect your choice in healthcare.

A government health plan would use its built-in advantages to eventually take over the entire health insurance market, meaning employers wouldn't be able to continue offering the high-quality private coverage their workers enjoy today. Specifically, the House bill would give the government-run plan many financial advantages right from the start, such as an exemption from federal and state taxes that private plans must pay. The major employer groups oppose a government-run health plan because it would make employer plans more expensive. Take action now to keep your choice in healthcare .

Urge your lawmakers to keep a government plan out of healthcare reform and instead build on the employer-based system that's already working for more than 160 million Americans. That means opposing any provision that would establish a government plan immediately or make one inevitable through a back-door "trigger."

Thank you in advance for making your voice heard on this important issue and for telling Congress to Get Health Reform Right for America .

++ John and Sara on this chain.

Brad and I just chatted. We think the following posture makes sense:

"Bernie's call for banning all hydraulic fracturing is, extreme, unfeasible and ignores the contribution natural gas has made to our economy and our efforts to reduce carbon pollution. What we need to focus on is putting in place common sense safeguards to protect our air and water, like mandatory disclosure of fracking chemicals, closing the Halliburton loophole, regulations to reduce methane emissions from both new and existing sources. Hillary has called for all of these things to make sure that those communities that choose to pursue natural gas development do so safely and responsibly. And she will stand by those communities that decide they don't want natural gas production to occur."

Did I capture it Brad? We are seeing if some progressive allies can hit Bernie for being too extreme on this.

McCain Lobbyist Ties Questioned in Ad, Complaint

June 08, 2008 3:22 PM

http://blogs.abcnews.com/politicalradar/2008/06/mccain-lobbyist.html

ABC News' Rick Klein Reports: A watchdog group is launching an advertising campaign and filing an FEC complaint questioning the McCain campaign's ties to lobbyists, as Sen. John McCain and Sen. Barack Obama spar over each other's ties to special interests.

The TV ad from Campaign Money Watch, set to run on Washington, D.C., broadcast and cable outlets starting Monday, focuses on McCain's role in the awarding of an Air Force contract that would eventually go to the French company Airbus instead of the American company Boeing.

"Seven of McCain's staff and fundraisers lobbied for Airbus," the ad says. "And guess what? John McCain intervened, which helped Airbus get that Pentagon contract. Tell John McCain to kick those lobbyists off the Straight Talk Express."

The group is also asking the Federal Election Commission to investigate two other public reports that touch on McCain's connections to lobbyists: That a lobbying company, the Loeffler Group LLP, made payments this year to McCain's national finance director, Susan Nelson; and that a company controlled in part by campaign manager Rick Davis sliced more than $100,000 off of McCain campaign's tab, when the campaign was starved for cash last year.

While working for Loeffler, Nelson lobbied on behalf of Airbus.
Newsweek reported last month that Nelson was rehired early this year as a consultant for the company, while on the McCain campaign's payroll.

Campaign Money Watch alleges that the payments made by the Loeffler Group and the discount arranged by the company 3eDC could amount to illegal corporate contributions, according to an FEC complaint to be filed Monday. A copy of the group's letter to the FEC was provided to ABC News.

"That both of these matters involve excess or illegal contributions from for-profit entities raises serious questions about the McCain campaign that must be answered," the complaint states. "Simply asserting, without evidence, that they have done nothing wrong does not, in our judgment, satisfactorily answer the serious possibility that federal election law has been violated on at least two separate occasions."

The McCain campaign dismissed the allegations, calling them "baseless" and expressing confidence that the FEC complaint would be dismissed.

On the Boeing-Airbus deal, McCain aides note that the senator did not directly intervene on Airbus' behalf, but rather encouraged the Air Force to level the playing field during the bidding process.

"This is a joke," said McCain spokesman Brian Rogers. "John McCain's investigation of the bogus tanker deal saved taxpayers over $6 billion and exposed one of the biggest scandals in Pentagon history, for which executives and government officials went to jail. And now he's being attacked for fighting corruption and shaking up the status quo in Washington? It's absurd."

Campaign Money Watch is a project of the Public Campaign Action Fund, a nonprofit organization that seeks to highlight politicians' ties to special interests. Officials said they would not disclose the size of their advertising buy.

This is absolutely huge. Maliki just essentially endorsed by name the Obama Iraq plan http://www.democracyarsenal.org/2008/07/its-over.html

It's Over
Posted by Ilan Goldenberg

Not much to say here. Other than the fact that this is a huge huge huge deal. Article speaks for itself.

In an interview with Der Spiegel released on Saturday, Maliki said he wanted U.S. troops to withdraw from Iraq as soon as possible.

"U.S. presidential candidate Barack Obama talks about 16 months. That, we think, would be the right timeframe for a withdrawal, with the possibility of slight changes"

And

Asked if he supported Obama's ideas more than those of John McCain, Republican presidential hopeful, Maliki said he did not want to recommend who people should vote for.

"Whoever is thinking about the shorter term is closer to reality. Artificially extending the stay of U.S. troops would cause problems."

And

"The Americans have found it difficult to agree on a concrete timetable for the exit because it seems like an admission of defeat to them. But it isn't," Maliki told Der Spiegel.

Is there anything left to say?

Iraqi PM backs Obama troop exit plan: report
Sat Jul 19, 2008 7:38am EDT

BERLIN (Reuters) - Iraqi Prime Minister Nuri al-Maliki told a German magazine he supported prospective U.S. Democratic presidential candidate Barack Obama's proposal that U.S. troops should leave Iraq within 16 months.

In an interview with Der Spiegel released on Saturday, Maliki said he wanted U.S. troops to withdraw from Iraq as soon as possible.

"U.S. presidential candidate Barack Obama talks about 16 months. That, we think, would be the right timeframe for a withdrawal, with the possibility of slight changes."

It is the first time he has backed the withdrawal timetable put forward by Obama, who is visiting Afghanistan and us set to go to Iraq as part of a tour of Europe and the Middle East.

Obama has called for a shift away from a "single-minded" focus on Iraq and wants to pull out troops within 16 months, instead adding U.S. soldiers to Afghanistan.

Asked if he supported Obama's ideas more than those of John McCain, Republican presidential hopeful, Maliki said he did not want to recommend who people should vote for.

"Whoever is thinking about the shorter term is closer to reality. Artificially extending the stay of U.S. troops would cause problems."

Maliki, who is due to visit Germany this week, has suggested a timetable should be set for a U.S. withdrawal but U.S. officials have been more cautious, despite an improving security situation.

The White House said on Friday President George W. Bush and Maliki had agreed that a security deal under negotiation should set a "time horizon" for meeting "aspirational goals" for reducing U.S. forces in Iraq.

"The Americans have found it difficult to agree on a concrete timetable for the exit because it seems like an admission of defeat to them. But it isn't," Maliki told Der Spiegel.

Some five years after the U.S.-led invasion, there are still some 146,000 U.S. soldiers in Iraq.

turn to this ASAP.

The most recent Blade article has Elizabeth Birch quoted as saying there was no amendment threat in 1996. Hilary Rosen has already tweeted the same. I'll ask on the call, but my sense is that there aren't many friends who will back us up on the point. That's why I'm urging us to back off as much as we can there.

Relatedly, if we release a statement tonight, it will very clearly be in response to the Maddow interview. To the extent we can, I advocate for owning that so that we can clean this up completely, rightly position her as a champion of LGBT issues, and make sure we move on from any discussion of looming amendments or her being involved in passing either DADT or DOMA. Without getting into the weeds, can we say that the broader point is that the country is in a different place now on LGBT issues -- and thank goodness it is -- and that she's so happy each policy has been placed in the dustbin of history?

Last thought: I have raised this a few times to a smaller number of people on this thread but will flag this for the larger group as well. At Keene State College, she specifically cited friends playing a part in her evolution, which we echo here. That's fine, IMO, and quite believable. But if I were a reporter and wanted to keep the evolution story alive, I would start asking which friends she was talking to and ask us to provide them. Not a problem per se, but I think it is worth flagging now so we aren't caught by surprise later.

It turns out I was mistaken and the effort to pass a constitutional amendment banning same-sex marriage came some years later. The larger point I was trying to make about DOMA, however, is still true. It was neither proposed nor supported by anyone in the Clinton administration at the time. It was an effort by the Republicans in Congress to distract attention from the real issues facing the country by using gay marriage, which had very little support then, as a wedge issue in the election. The legislation passed by overwhelming veto-proof margins in both houses of Congress and President Clinton signed it with serious reservations he expressed at the time. Luckily the country has evolved way beyond this in the last 20 years and most Americans, including the Supreme Court, now embrace LGBT equality. We are a better country for it. Although there is much work that remains, and I'm eager to help advance the day when we are all truly equal.

> > > In 1996, I signed the Defense of Marriage Act. Although that was only 17 years ago, it was a very different time. In no state in the union was same-sex marriage recognized, much less available as a legal right, but some were moving in that direction. Washington, as a result, was swirling with all manner of possible responses, some quite draconian. As a bipartisan group of former senators stated in their March 1 amicus brief to the Supreme Court, many supporters of the bill known as DOMA believed that its passage "would defuse a movement to enact a constitutional amendment banning gay marriage, which would have ended the debate for a generation or more." It was under these circumstances that DOMA came to my desk, opposed by only 81 of the 535 members of Congress.

On March 27, DOMA will come before the Supreme Court, and the justices must decide whether it is consistent with the principles of a nation that honors freedom, equality and justice above all, and is therefore constitutional. As the president who signed the act into law, I have come to believe that DOMA is contrary to those principles and, in fact, incompatible with our Constitution.

Because Section 3 of the act defines marriage as being between a man and a woman, same-sex couples who are legally married in nine states and the District of Columbia are denied the benefits of more than a thousand federal statutes and programs available to other married couples. Among other things, these couples cannot file their taxes jointly, take unpaid leave to care for a sick or injured spouse or receive equal family health and pension benefits as federal civilian employees. Yet they pay taxes, contribute to their communities and, like all couples, aspire to live in committed, loving relationships, recognized and respected by our laws.

When I signed the bill, I included a statement with the admonition that "enactment of this legislation should not, despite the fierce and at times divisive rhetoric surrounding it, be understood to provide an excuse for discrimination." Reading those words today, I know now that, even worse than providing an excuse for discrimination, the law is itself discriminatory. It should be overturned.

We are still a young country, and many of our landmark civil rights decisions are fresh enough that the voices of their champions still echo, even as the world that preceded them becomes less and less familiar. We have yet to celebrate the centennial of the 19th Amendment, but a society that denied women the vote would seem to us now not unusual or old-fashioned but alien. I believe that in 2013 DOMA and opposition to marriage equality are vestiges of just such an unfamiliar society.

Americans have been at this sort of a crossroads often enough to recognize the right path. We understand that, while our laws may at times lag behind our best natures, in the end they catch up to our core values. One hundred fifty years ago, in the midst of the Civil War, President Abraham

Lincoln concluded a message to Congress by posing the very question we face today: “It is not ‘Can any of us imagine better?’ but ‘Can we all do better?’”

The answer is of course and always yes. In that spirit, I join with the Obama administration, the petitioner Edith Windsor , and the many other dedicated men and women who have engaged in this struggle for decades in urging the Supreme Court to overturn the Defense of Marriage Act.

Subject: one chain on DOMA

Think all of us are getting incoming from friends in LGBT community about DOMA comments.

HuffPo has reached out to us. I heard from Socarides that NYT was doing something.

I have no understanding of the issue – but clear this has a head of steam.

Brian can put a statement out, but policy and political need to tell us what you want us to do.

I would suggest a conference call with relevant parties for how we are going to handle all around – press, groups, politics. I have a bad schedule for rest of day and may not be able to be on such a call but don't think I am needed.

We just need guidance and then on political end think we need a plan for how to hose down anxious friends.

Hi John,

Knox College is my alma mater. You probably don't remember me - I was a naive young woman from Tulsa, Oklahoma. You may recall a "crazy" letter to the editor that my "uber" conservative father wrote to The Knox Student in response to your article entitled "American Militarism". I was elected to the at-large student senate seat that you vacated just before the Student Senate imploded.

The purpose of this communication is to request some kind of "official" acknowledgement of the matriarch of an exceptional family who turns 100 years old on April 3rd. Please read the note and brief biography written by her granddaughter.

Allow me to express my heartfelt gratitude in advance for any assistance you can provide as we celebrate and honor the life of a truly amazing American. Sincerely, Joan

I think we can definitely get the first answered. I will make sure to flag.
The second is a good question I will raise. The rationale section starts with groups which I think is really important. The first survey is really meant to be a lay of the land--what are people's fav/unfavs, right track/ wrong track, initial head to head, etc. Very basic. Then the online panel is supposed to provide some qualitative to underpin that. We also have the qualitative Garin already did. But that may not be the right way to go and I'll ask the pollsters about that. Like I said, I'm certain the plan will change--I am many things, but a pollster is not one!

I am in favor of getting going along the lines outlined. One track I think we should explore is whether and how attacks from the right strengthen and immunize her on the left. Another question I have is whether qualitative is being used enough to inform the early quantitative research.

My one thought from the conversation I participated in with Wendy is that her strength is in branding and marketing, using the evidence base in determining how to generate the behaviors sought in the target audience. So I think she has the capacity and creativity to drive the brand development and strategy from inception to execution. I imagine she would rely on the data that is being collected through the polling and focus groups you outline but equally as important, would likely have questions she might suggest specifically

This may make more sense once you meet her and have a thoughtful conversation about her strenghts and talents. Then i think her active engagement can be efficient and productive for the activity you have outlined. Should we arrange a time for you to meet her or at least connect with her by telephone?

Claim: Clinton Collected $50K Per Month From MF Global

Former president's new firm Teneo Strategy was hired to boost Corzine.

by Neil W. McCabe

12/05/2011

A former MF Global employee accused former president William J. Clinton of collecting $50,000 per month through his Teneo advisory firm in the months before the brokerage careened towards its Halloween filing for Chapter 11 bankruptcy.
Teneo was hired by MF Global's former CEO Jon S. Corzine to improve his image and to enhance his connections with Clinton's political family, said the employee, who asked that his name be withheld because he feared retribution.

"They were supposed to be helping Corzine improve his image as a CEO—I guess you can tell how that went," he said. Corzine resigned as CEO and chairman November 4.

Before Corzine joined MF Global in May 2010, the firm was a smart and well-run commodities broker, a culture that was turned upside-down by his leadership style, he said.

"The traders would be shaking their heads," he said. "They would come back to their desk and say, 'Well, I thought we were going to do this—but Corzine would come by and do something else all by himself,'" he said.

The Teneo contract with MF Global lasted at least five months, he said. "The board cancelled it after Corzine resigned."

The source, who is no longer associated with MF Global, said Teneo is a dual-track company with one side devoted to merchant and investment banking and the other side set up to provide image and strategy consulting services.

Clinton is the chairman of the company's advisory board. His duties and compensation have not been released. The other member of the board is former British prime minister Tony Blair .

Two of the three founding partners are very close to the former president and his wife, Secretary of State Hillary R. Clinton. They are Douglas J. Band, who is the former president's counselor and has served on his personal staff since 1995 and Declan Kelly, who earned the "Hillraiser" status in the secretary's 2008 run for president for bundling more than $100,000 for the campaign.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Another prominent member of the Clinton political family is Tom Shea . Shea is a senior vice president for Teneo Strategy and served as Corzine's chief of staff, when Corzine was the governor of New Jersey.

Kelly sold his public relations firm Financial Dynamics in 2006 to FTI for $340 million, and stayed with that company until July 2009, when he joined the State Department as the Economic Envoy to Northern Ireland.

The source said, "Kelly was given a job they created out our whole cloth." The job did not exist previously.

"He basically got to ride around developing a book of business, while he waited for his non-compete clause to run out," he said.

Kelley and the former president traveled together networking and making introductions at international conferences and events, he said.

The Secretary of State also traveled with Kelly, including the October 2010 U.S. – Northern Ireland Economics Conference, which Kelly organized and at which the secretary was the featured speaker.

The secretary announced that she accepted Kelly's resignation May 11.

Teneo landed its first major client June 1, when the Rockefeller Foundation gave Teneo a $3,447,150, six-month contract to help plan the foundation's 2013 centennial.

The foundation is another member of the Clinton's extended family. It gave Clinton its Lifetime Innovation Achievement Award July 27 and the foundation is listed as a between $1 to $5 million contributor to the William J. Clinton Foundation, along with several members of the Rockefeller family who are listed as individual contributors.

[In the preparation of this story, several emails and phone calls were placed to Teneo, MF Global and the State Department for comment. In each case, there was no response.]

HRC is not free until 11pm at the earliest.

If we have everything done and circualted to her, she would like to do a call tonight.

That means the 930pm call John/PIR is doing to touch base with the consultants will be a call to say that we are still working through content with her and what time should we do a call with them all tomorrow once we have content she is comfortable with rather than anything more until we have something to share.

If you all can be free for a call with her between 11pm - 12am, I am inclined to make sure we send her updated material by 1030pm and tell her we will get on with her at 1130pm.

Will that work for you all?

That's a good point. They're hitting us for not having enough young, grassroots donors, but capriciously blocking the single best quiver in our arrow!

And I'm not sure what to make of the "priority" line in the second paragraph. Does that mean we get nothing?

Let me know if I ought to be the one to push back or if you want to huddle to discuss next steps.

Donna has nothing to do with that. None of us like it - as I keep saying.

And yesterday, WJC told the Foundation folks that their social media asks for December would take priority.

The last piece is you had asked for a way to track results that we could keep updated. I created this google doc and just have the birthday email in here from yesterday currently but we could use this to build out and keep updated.

Results: https://docs.google.com/a/hillaryclinton.com/spreadsheets/d/1KJJg1c0BETB-_mTwd5n2frTnryicPYedfkRtIJY-MZo/edit?usp=sharing

The birthday email has now raised $80K - and from an email that does not directly ask for money -- this is incredible!!!

Thanks for reading this far if you did! Let me know know what you think and if I missed anything in here. Cheers, Katie

What are we doing today

On Sunday, March 6, 2016, Milia Fisher <mfisher@hillaryclinton.com > wrote:

Hillary Clinton – We Cannot Wait to Help the People of Flint

This has to be a national priority. What happened in Flint is immoral.
The children of Flint are just as precious as the children of any part of America.
– Hillary Clinton, House of Prayer Missionary Baptist Church
Flint, Michigan, February 7, 2016

Hillary Clinton knows that the children of Flint have waited too long for help. For nearly two years their parents spoke out about problems with the city's water—only to be silenced and ignored. Later, scientists and pediatricians added evidence to those parental concerns—and yet they were told that they still did not have proof that there was a real problem.

We now know that the population of Flint has been exposed to dangerously high levels of lead in the water—and the children who have been exposed are most likely to suffer long-term consequences. Enough is enough. Hillary Clinton is not going to wait to help the people of Flint. After visiting Flint herself and sending her daughter and senior campaign officials to learn more from community leaders and experts on what the community most needs, today Hillary is announcing that she will:

- Work with Mayor Weaver to Restart More Frequent Home Water Delivery by Hiring Local Residents to Deliver Water. When the Governor recalled part of the National Guard and the state police several weeks ago, the State Emergency Operations Center had to significantly scale back their home delivery of water and their door-to-door public information campaign. Now residents must go to their local fire station to pick up water, which is extremely burdensome for the elderly, the disabled, parents of newborns or those who are working multiple jobs just to get by. Hillary Clinton is committed to raising the necessary resources and partnering with the Mayor and community partners to ensure that local residents can be hired to continue to deliver water so that every resident receives a water delivery every three days.

- Encourage everyone around the country to support the children of Flint by donating to the Flint Child Health and Development Fund , which is working to provide health care and educational support to families in Flint affected by this crisis. We know that lead poisoning can affect kids for their whole lives, so 100 percent of donations will help provide ongoing services for the next 20 years to the most vulnerable families in Flint. Hillary's effort is aimed at helping the people of Flint make significant progress on reaching their goal of raising $100 million for this critical fund.

- Ask her Hillary for America volunteers to deliver water instead of canvassing for votes. Today, Hillary for America volunteers joined the Red Cross and United Way effort to distribute water to the neediest residents of Flint.

- Provide Connections and Support to Help Health and Education Officials Expand their Capacity. Hillary Clinton has been working in the area of child health, development and well-being for decades and she is calling on experts from around the country to lend their support and services. For example, together with Senator Debbie Stabenow, she encouraged Dr. Irwin Redlener of the Children's Health Fund to bring two mobile health units to Flint – one to be used for comprehensive primary care and the other to be used to provide rolling mental health services.

These immediate actions are in addition to her continued call for greater federal and state support for the people of Flint. Hillary Clinton urges:

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Congress to put their differences aside and act immediately to pass the emergency funding proposal, put forward by Senators Stabenow and Peters, and Congressman Kildee, to replace and rebuild the pipes in Flint to ensure that families can safely drink again from their faucets. It is an unbelievable abdication of responsibility for Congress to have adjourned for a week's long vacation without having resolved their differences over funding for Flint, while families in Flint have no access to safe water in their homes.

  The Senate should also pass the bipartisan safe drinking water amendments to ensure that the EPA notifies consumers when concentrations of lead in drinking water exceed certain levels and when corrosiveness from water being transported in lead pipes could leech into public drinking water – so that we never have a situation like Flint again where consumers were kept in the dark about the safety of the water they were drinking. This legislation was recently passed by the House under the leadership of Representatives Dan Kildee and Fred Upton, and has been introduced in the Senate by Senators Peters and Stabenow.

  Finally, Congress should work urgently to pass the Children's Head Start Intervention for Life and Development (CHILD) Act, sponsored by Senators Peters and Stabenow and Congressman Kildee in the House, which would establish one-time Head Start and Early Head Start grants to areas impacted by water polluted with lead and other toxic substances, including Flint. We know that the children of Flint need early interventions and support to mitigate the impacts of lead poisoning.

- The Obama Administration to continue to build on their actions to increase access to nutrition and health services by providing a Medicaid waiver to Michigan so that every resident of Flint who is 21 years or younger and pregnant women who have been exposed to Flint's lead contaminated water will automatically be enrolled in health care. Providing universal Medicaid coverage to all residents under 21 would allow Flint to build on their Children's Healthcare Access Program (CHAP) to ensure that every child in Flint has a medical home to coordinate care and needed services.

- Governor Snyder and the state legislature to quickly pass the $195 million proposed by the Governor in his budget to provide the families of Flint access to safe drinking water, physical health, food and nutrition, education, and social and developmental services. And the state should work to immediately provide the $25 million in emergency funding Governor Snyder has proposed as a down payment in the effort to repair and rebuild Flint's water pipes.

  Together, the Governor and Congress should ensure that Mayor Weaver receives the full $55 million in support she needs to implement the Fast Start Lead Service Line Replacement Program so that the water infrastructure in Flint may be repaired to remove any danger of lead poisoning now or in the future.

Even with all of the fixes proposed above, Hillary Clinton believes that Flint, like so many cities that have been left behind, needs real, immediate investments to spur good job creation, rebuild crumbling infrastructure, and connect housing to opportunity. That is why last week, Hillary Clinton released the first part of her "Breaking Down Every Barrier Agenda," committing $125 billion to an Economic Revitalization Initiative that will grow the economy in communities that are being left out and left behind. Hillary Clinton recognizes that for Flint to continue to rebuild and strengthen, we need real jobs and real economic growth.

Check out our latest blog post, Building Partnerships Between Colleges and Underserved Communities , by Mike Burns of EPA's Region 4. Mike discusses EPA's College/Underserved-Communities Partnership Program, in which EPA works to help build partnerships between local colleges and the surrounding communities. "Through the program, schools provide technical support to communities at no cost to them. Small rural communities are able to use this assistance to address important issues - like energy savings projects, land reuse, and economic development - that will support the long-term viability of their communities." Do you know a school, or does your school want to make a difference in the lives of those who need the help the most? Let us know!

Last week, students at the International Human Rights Law Clinic, UC Berkeley School of Law, talk about the recent Consultation on Environmental Issues hosted at their school and explored the importance of public engagement on environmental issues: http://blog.epa.gov/ej/2015/02/a-bedrock-principle-for-human-rights/ .

Subject:	Responding to Baltimore: a Prayer for Peace and Justice in Our Communities

Dear Law Center Community,

Many of us have been challenged and distressed by the recent events in Baltimore. Our prayer includes all of those suffering in our nation and our communities at this time. We ask God for help in building peace grounded in justice. Please know that the doors of the Office of Campus Ministry are always open, and we strive to create a safe and supportive space for anyone who would like to speak with us. Please see below for more information.

Next Tuesday, May 5th, we invite the Law Center Community to join us as we celebrate a daily Mass for justice and peace in our country and hold an Interreligious Gathering for prayer & meditation in remembrance of Freddie Gray and others.

The Dedicated Mass will take place 12:00-12:30pm, in St. Thomas More Chapel in McDonough Hall. Everyone is welcome to attend this Catholic service.

The Interreligious Gathering will take place 12:35-1:00pm, also in St. Thomas More Chapel. This will be a space in which those gathered will be invited to reflect individually, and share prayers or readings as they feel moved.

Yours sincerely,

Fr. Paul Rourke, S.J.

Subject: RE: Arkansas flag and Robert E Lee day

Hello, kids – here's some more background info just in case it's needed. Please note that milk is the official state beverage

The State of Arkansas celebrated its sesquicentennial in 1986, but the General Assembly did not meet in Regular Session in 1986, so both the 1985 and 1987 Regular Sessions saw packages of bills dealing with the "official" symbols of the state. From the looks of the bills, legislators were taking up subjects/issues that had long been matter of custom but had never been enshrined in Code.

The title of Senate Bill 377 makes this abundantly clear: "AN ACT TO ADOPT THE DESIGN OF THE STATE FLAG AS DESCRIBED IN SENATE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 11 OF 1913, AS AMENDED BY HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 4 OF 1923, AND HOUSE CONCURRENT RESOLUTION 11 OF THE SECOND EXTRAORDINARY SESSION OF 1924.

This is not a new design for the flag, and there is no record in media accounts that we can find that indicates that there was ever any public discussion about the design at the time. They were merely enshrining in state code what had happened via resolution many years before. The bill passed both chambers without a dissenting vote, indicating that there was no controversy.

The package of "sesquicentennial bills" in 1987 included:

SB 377 by Senator Bill Moore on the state flag
HCR 1003 by Rep. Stephens, which established "Arkansas" as the official "State Anthem" and "Arkansas (You Run Deep In Me) as the official "State Song."
HCR 1007 by Rep. Fairchild that established "The Arkansas Traveler" as the official "state historical song."
HB 1541 (Act 850) by Rep. Flanigan requiring the Arkansas Secretary of State to provide sheet music to "Arkansas" to anyone who requested a copy.
HB 1480 (Act 255) by Rep. Lipton establishing "The South Arkansas Vine Ripe Pink Tomato" as BOTH the "State Fruit" AND the "State Vegetable."
HB 1014 (Act 40) Establishing English as the "Official Language" of Arkansas.

The package of "sesquicentennial bills" in 1985 included:

Act 414 which requires the Arkansas Secretary of State to maintain and distribute a stock of Arkansas state flags.
Act 998 which established milk as the "State Beverage."
Act 277 which established the fiddle as the "State Musical Instrument."

We can push back on Jake on the star; frankly the revelvant question about Robert E Lee Day is whether or not HRC and WJC support ending the holiday and the other states where it is celebrated. (I dont think Jake will care shy it was created in the first place in terms of whether or not he chooses to talk about it)There is a movement pushing for abolishing the holdiday and all others related to the confederacy. So a statement denouncing all would shut down this piecemeal oppo push.

Would also like to say something publicly before HRC does the JJ dinner in Arkansas so it doesn't become a will she or wont she narrative leading up to the dinner.

He's just inaccurate -- the additional star on the flag for the Confederacy was added in 1924. Neither I nor anyone I've talked to in Arkansas (including WJC) knows what the rationale was behind the 1987 deal - - though something WJC said has given me a thread to look into.

And if you want to know the rationale for combining Robert E. Lee and MLK - happy to explain.

FYI - Tapper just followed up just now with the below note. My sense is his hosting CNN's Republican debate and the criticism he got for doing CGI is contributing to his keeping at this one.

From Tappper:

"Just confirming that you're not going to have any comment on steps President Clinton took during his gubernatorial tenure to honor the Confederacy – designating one of the stars (among many) on the Arkansas flag in honor of the Confederacy, and separate measures to honor Jefferson Davis and Robert E. Lee.

I'm not saying that steps taking in the 80s to honor the Confederacy are the same exact thing as waving the rebel flag at the state house in South Carolina today.

But honoring the Confederacy is what it is, and it seems reasonable to ask about that.

Thoughts?"

campaign 2008
Union: Respect, but don't vote for McCain
Focus on economic issues, AFL-CIO says
By Jill Zuckman

Washington Bureau

June 21, 2008

WASHINGTON — Jim Wasser, an electrician from Kankakee, Ill., stands defiantly, hands on hips, wearing a bright orange International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers T-shirt with a message from the AFL-CIO to 400,000 of its union members in key swing states.

"John McCain? War hero? Absolutely," says Wasser, a Navy veteran who served in Vietnam with Sen. John Kerry (D-Mass.). "Voice for working families? No way."

Worried about McCain's appeal among its members and even more worried about Sen. Barack Obama's difficulty attracting white, non-college-educated working-class voters, the AFL-CIO is spending $53.4 million to reach 13 million of its members and their families. The plan is to try to peel them away from McCain by persuading them to vote their economic interest, which they say would be hurt — not helped — by McCain.

As soon as he seemed to be closing in on the Republican nomination for president this winter, organized labor began polling its members and holding focus groups to find out what people thought about the Arizona senator.

"They had a lot of respect for his service to the country, but were unclear about his positions on unions and unclear about his positions in general," said Karen Ackerman, political director for the AFL-CIO. "They felt he was a maverick and took positions different from the Bush administration. They had a favorable view of him."

Support of Democrats
At the same time, McCain has spoken frequently about his desire to find support among "Reagan Democrats" — the white, blue-collar voters in industrial sections of the country who helped Ronald Reagan win the White House in 1980.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"He's probably in the best position of anybody since Reagan, just looking at his popularity, his favorable ratings," said Charles Black Jr., McCain's chief strategist, adding that McCain shares similar views on social issues and national security with many blue-collar workers.

Asked why working-class voters would support him, McCain said recently that he would offer them a safe and prosperous country, and noted he has sharp differences with Obama.

"I won't tell them that in small towns across America and in Pennsylvania that they are bitter and angry about their economic condition, so therefore they embrace religion and the 2nd Amendment of the Constitution of the United States," McCain said in a dig at controversial comments Obama made at a fundraiser in San Francisco. "I will never do that, because I know why they embrace their constitutional rights and I know why they embrace their religion because of the fundamentally good and decent people that are the reason why America is the pre-eminent nation in the world today."

'An American hero'
Peter Brown, assistant director of the Quinnipiac University Polling Institute, which specializes in swing-state polling, called it smart politics by the AFL-CIO to give its members information that might turn them away from McCain.

"Many of these people were reluctant to vote for Obama in the primary; they were looking for an alternative and now McCain is the alternative," Brown said. "He's not a hard-line conservative; that's attractive. He's an American hero. These are people who respect the military and military service. He has kept his distance from a president who is incredibly unpopular with this group."

McCain was a Navy fighter pilot who was shot down over Hanoi and spent 51/2 years as a prisoner of war, frequently tortured by his captors.

Joe Rugola, the AFL-CIO president in Ohio and international vice president of the American Federation of State, County and Municipal Employees, began talking to his members in March aknocking on doors, calling on the phone and distributing literature at work sites.

At the heart of his message: "Generally speaking, the senator has never met a trade deal he didn't love regardless of the impact on American workers and American families," Rugola said.

The union federation is using micro-targeting to determine which members are more interested in learning about health care or trade or the economy to ensure they get the information that will best convince them that McCain does not represent their interests. Labor officials are dogging McCain at his campaign events, raising questions about his policies. On Friday, following McCain's trade speech in Ottawa, Canada, the AFL-CIO organized a conference call for reporters with Sen. Sherrod Brown (D-Ohio) to criticize McCain's pro-trade stance.

The labor federation also created a Web site, mccainrevealed.org, to show where McCain stands on issues.

In particular, the AFL-CIO has focused attention on five key states: Ohio, Pennsylvania, Michigan, Minnesota and Wisconsin. Union households comprise 25 percent to 35 percent of the vote in those states, which have the potential to decide the election.

Mike Podhorzer, the AFL-CIO's deputy political director, said, "McCain's got to get non-college, working-class voters to come his way. That is going to be the battleground. If he's successful, he has a chance to be president. If he's not, there's no path to victory for him. The union program is really part of putting up a firewall against that. The only way he gets the majorities in a place like Michigan is through ignorance."

Mailers include such messages as "John McCain wants to tax your health care" and "John McCain thinks NAFTA was a good idea."

So far, Ackerman and Podhorzer believe the program has been working. In February, 57 percent of their members had a positive view of McCain. In April, it dropped to just 33 percent, according to polling conducted for the labor federation.

The general board of the AFL-CIO is expected to vote soon on endorsing Obama. And eventually their campaign against McCain will include pro-Obama messages.

Wasser, who served with Kerry on his first swift boat in Vietnam, spoke out against attacks on Kerry's war record during the 2004 election. Today, he said, he wants to be sure his fellow union members know the truth about where McCain stands on the issues that matter to them.

"I want people to see that they have to look at the real John McCain and not at the war hero," Wasser said. "I respect his service to this country. I don't know how he endured what he did. That was a superhuman thing. But I can't take another four years of a George Bush term."

Subject:	Qatar, Brazil, Peru, Malawi, Rwanda

Last Thursday, April 12, I met individually with the Ambassadors from Qatar, Brazil, Peru, Malawi, and Rwanda, in Washington, DC. Below is a summary of key points from each meeting, and we are following-up on each point. I'd welcome your feedback. Sincerely, Ami

QATAR
- Would like to see WJC "for five minutes" in NYC, to present $1 million check that Qatar promised for WJC's birthday in 2011.
- Qatar would welcome our suggestions for investments in Haiti – particularly on education and health. They have allocated most of their $20 million but are happy to consider projects we suggest. I'm collecting input from CF Haiti team.

BRAZIL
- President Rousseff may come to NYC for UN in September; I pitched CGI, again, and will continue to do so.
- We agreed to try to arrange a WJC-Rousseff meeting whenever she and he are next in the same city.
- With regard to Rio climate conference, Ambassador's team is going to think about any sites that WJC could visit to highlight Brazil's leadership on climate issues. [I made clear WJC visit to Rio is undecided.] They said they'd be happy for WJC to come.
- I committed to send them details on CCI in Brazil.
- Ambassador mentioned Lula receiving an award in Iowa and how much Lula enjoyed Iowa. I suggested Lula come to Little Rock when WJC convenes meeting of former heads of state (Club of Madrid). Also discussed Ambassador going to Little Rock to speak with Clinton School students – he said he'd like to. I'll work with Stephanie on this.\
- We discussed Lula's health – Ambassador said he's recovering and still committed to agriculture work in Africa. We agreed it would be good for WJC and Lula to do something together on agriculture in Africa.

PERU
- Per CGSGI, I asked for Ambassador's ideas on which sectors/parts of Peru to focus on in order to create jobs. He suggested we speak with his son, an alderman in Lima, about jobs projects for young men who otherwise could be recruited by gangs. Ambassador also suggested speaking with Minister for Women and Vulnerable Populations, Ms. Ana Jara, for jobs projects for women.

MALAWI
- Ambassador told story of Mutharika's death (said he collapsed with no prior symptoms during a morning meeting, was taken to hospital, then flown to South Africa but passed away en route); and emphasized significance of smooth transition to successor, within their constitutional framework. Sounds like new President is laying low until the memorial service for Mutharika, and then plans to announce her new government.
- Ambassador again urged that CDI consider dairy/cattle projects; I reminded him we'd be happy to speak with minister of agriculture or whoever Ambassador suggests in the industry; he said he'd let us know.

RWANDA
- Kagame is organizing an event in June to commemorate closing of Gacaca process for the genocide. They asked if WJC could go. I said Africa trip is probably in July and we haven't decided countries yet but if there's anything they'd want WJC to do in Rwanda in July, to let us know. I also said to let us know if they'd want a message from WJC for the June event; they'll let us know.
- Ambassador asked if WJC/CF/CGI could do anything to help on education/universities in Rwanda. I explained we are constrained by funding but if they have specific ideas, to let us know. He said they'll put together some ideas for us.
- Ambassador asked about attracting more investments/businesses to Rwanda, including mining/ natural resources investors. I emphasized CGI as an opportunity for Kagame to engage investors. I also mentioned Barclays interest in doing something at CGI on investing in Africa. Also mentioned Kagame doing a side-meeting at/around CGI that convenes investors interested in Rwanda, akin to WJC's investor meeting for Ireland or session WJC did for Haiti last year at CGI.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- Ambassador said criticism of Kagame seems to have quieted, partly due to WJC and Blair's unwavering support for Kagame. Ambassador said Kagame and Rwanda very much appreciate WJC's unflinching support.

We know, John. We ask a lot. (Ok, a ton).

There's a good reason why:

-- In 2012, Bob Dold and outside groups spent more than $8,000,000 against us.
-- In 2014, they're on pace to spend even more to beat up on Brad's progressive record.

But the most important reason is simple:

-- If we don't have the resources to respond, we could lose.

That might sound grim, but it's the truth.

9 days left. Will you rush a donation of $5 or more to help Brad get out the facts to Illinois voters?

Brad's in a down-to-the-wire fight. He's working day and night to make sure Illinois's 10th District is represented by a Democrat -- not a reliable Republican.

But Tuesday marks exactly ONE WEEK out from Election Day and our last MAJOR deadline of the election. After that, it could be too late to make a difference.

So John, please chip in to have Brad's back before it's too late.

- Tickets are non-transferrable.
- Changes to your itinerary may affect your fare.
- Refund and exchange restrictions and penalties for failure to cancel unwanted travel may apply. If your travel plans change, call us before departure to change your reservation. If you do not board your train, your entire reservation from that point will be canceled. If you board a different train without notifying us, you will have to pay for it separately; the conductor cannot apply the money paid for your prior reservation. For all travel on or after March 1, 2014, for most Acela Express Business class reservations and Reserved Coach class reservations, you must cancel your reservation at least 24 hours prior to the train's departure in order to be eligible for a full refund. If the reservation is canceled within 24 hours of departure, a refund fee will apply. If the reservation is not canceled prior to scheduled departure ("no show"), the entire amount paid for the reservation will be forfeited. See the refund/exchange policy at Amtrak.com/refund.
- Summary of Conditions of Contract: Ticket valid for carriage or refund (subject to the refund rules of the fare purchased) for twelve months after date of issue unless otherwise specified. Amtrak tickets may only be sold or issued by Amtrak or an authorized travel agent/tour operator. Tickets sold or issued by an unauthorized third party will be voided by Amtrak. This ticket is a contract of carriage between Amtrak and the ticket holder, which is subject to specific terms and conditions, which are available for inspection at Amtrak ticket counters, on the Amtrak website at Amtrak.com/conditionsofcontract, or by calling 1-800-USA-RAIL. Tickets sold for non-Amtrak service are subject to the tariffs of the providing carrier.
- Questions? Contact us online at Amtrak.com/contact or call 1-800-USA-RAIL (1-800-872-7245) or TDD/TTY (1-800-523-6590).

Please click the link above to access your mobile boarding pass(es). To quickly retrieve and display your mobile boarding pass, you should save the image on your mobile device.

Once at the airport, show this mobile boarding pass:
- at Curbside where available, Self-Service Kiosks or the American Airlines counter if you are checking baggage,
- at the security checkpoint,
- during the boarding of your flight.

If you forget your cell phone or mobile device, or delete the link to your boarding pass by mistake, you can print a paper boarding pass at a Self Service Machine or American Airlines Ticket Counter.
For your convenience, a paper boarding pass has also been attached to this email. If you have access to a printer, you can print your paper boarding pass(es) before proceeding to the airport. The attached document is not a mobile boarding pass and will not be accepted at the security checkpoint if displayed from your mobile device.

Thank you for choosing American Airlines.

Subject:	request for WJC to be on Pew Trusts' new Global Ocean Commission
Attachments:	20120306 Letter to President Clinton exploring interest in being patron of the GOC - FINAL.pdf Global Ocean Commision - detailed Feb 2012.pdf

As described in the attachments, Pew Charitable Trusts is convening a new Global Oceans Commission – to focus on preserving the high seas, which cover 50% of the planet and are mostly international waters – and they are asking WJC to be a "patron" alongside 12 other leaders including David Miliband and Ted Waitt. They say the Law of the Sea provides a framework but it doesn't go into detail on specific issues or activities happening on the high seas. As a result, there's a lot of over/illegal fishing and no governmental effort to create protected areas in high seas. Soon there'll be 40 year anniversary of the Law of the Seas. Pew's goal is to have this Commission look at overfishing, and articulate cost-effective measures on what needs to be done over next 50 years. They have the funding (from Pew, a Dutch family foundation called Adessium who we know, and the OceansFive (which includes Oak Fdn, Leo Dicaprio Fdn, Ted Waitt, and others). The Univ of Oxford is the host of the Commission. Pew is asking for WJC to be a "patron," which they say wouldn't entail much: WJC would give his name to it; keynote the launch in Fall 2012; provide background advice to the Chair of the Commission. Would be 18-24 months; and they have hired an Executive Secretary, Simon Reddy (who used to work at the C40), who starts March 21. They say the commission will be independent of any government. Outcome would be action points for governments. I explained sensitivity of not putting WJC into a position where is making or associated with policy recommendations that contradict HRC or USG positions; and challenge of taking on new things as we try to stay focused on delivering on things he already is committed to; and we discussed idea of highlighting it at CGI and thereby enabling WJC to be supportive without having any formal role or title in the Commission. [As background, Oceana, which approached WJC also via Ted Danson and to which WJC committed to attend fundraising event in Fall 2012), focuses on waters WITHIN countries' jurisdictions, whereas the Commission focuses on international waters. The Commission and Oceana know each other and have amicable relationship but they are distinct efforts.] My vote is to try to nurture this via CGI but for WJC not to take on a formal role with this Commission. I've already connected Pew folks with CGI folks to sort the details. Is it ok for us to proceed as suggested above, or would you or he like us to explore WJC being officially part of the Commission? Thanks, Ami

Dear Ami,

It was good speaking earlier. Thanks so much for calling me back. As discussed, attached is the letter that we have drafted for the President. It lays out what we might hope a Patron could do for the Commission. As I said, on the advice of both Tamera and Simon, we have tried to craft a role that threads the needles in terms of all of the pressures on the President, as well as some of the concerns he needs to take into account in terms of the U.S..

I am also very excited about the idea of pairing the launch of the Commission with the CGI if that might at all be a possibility, and look forward to hearing back from you once you have spoken to CGI staff. We would fully understand the unique opportunity that working with CGI might offer and should this proceed well, be prepared to commit to holding off on any launch if we did agree to working together. The backgrounder on the Commission, the partnerships we have secured and what it will try to do etc, is attached as well to this message.

Please feel free to call anytime with questions or thoughts.

All the best,

Karen

Hi John –

Sean emailed with bad news about Chamber of Commerce ads this morning, but I've got some better news:

After seeing Sean's message and one of the awful attack ads this morning, one of our supporters called the office asking what she could do to help us defeat Congresswoman Hayworth and stop Boehner. She's offered to match every contribution made before our ad buy deadline at noon tomorrow, dollar for dollar. This is your best opportunity to make your money count, just when we need it most (Roll Call says the polls are tightening, and it's true). If we don't take advantage of this opportunity right now, this race will slip through our fingers.

Can you chip in $250 for victory right now? Your money will double if you give before noon tomorrow.

Without your help, our ads will shut off tomorrow. Please step up.

– Maura

Well, things are less clear on the Republican side than we thought and they will continue to beat each other up. I think this means we have a little maneuvering space until R candidates start dropping out. It does still look like McCain will win it in the end.

Here is where I think we go:

1. Continue our McCain focused research. Groups, probably a message poll in lieu of state baselines.

2. Start prepping the "McCain is just like Bush. Same old thing." materials. We will all want to open on that even if we don't make that the big play. People need something to say about McCain if asked. Tara's draft talking points serve that purpose.

3. Continue to develop economic scripts and produce economic ads.

Any thoughts? I will ask Ryan to see if we can reconvene for a call this week.

Combining chains.

The idea was to do an event in Iowa with Brady on Tuesday. Political has also lined up a paper endorsement from Giffords for Monday.

I wasn't aware Giffords was happening during discussions with Brady so now trying to sell them on not going first. If there is any way we can commit to an additional event with WJC on our terms and our date (maybe Brady Bill anniversary) that would close the deal. Possible?

Subject: Meet the Dirty Dozen Class of '08

Dear John,

In 2006, LCV donors like you helped to remove 9 of the 13 "Dirty Dozen" - Members of Congress with the worst environmental records.

This election season, LCV Action Fund is aiming at the next crop of "dirty" candidates who are in the pockets of big corporate polluters. They stand in the way of serious attempts to address global warming in Congress.

I learned an important lesson in the last election season - the earlier we can get in these "Dirty Dozen" districts, the easier (and CHEAPER) it will be to take them down on election day.

That's why I'm writing to you today. I want our 2008 Dirty Dozen campaign to be bigger and better than ever. That is why we are starting earlier than ever.

Can I count on you to make sure we have the resources to defeat our opponents again this election?

Donate before September 26th - help us raise $20,000 in critical, early funding for our Dirty Dozen campaign.

Two of the 2008 candidates have already caught our attention - lucky them! - and I'm happy to share the inside scoop with you. We picked them because they are two of the biggest opponents in Congress to making progress on global warming.

Introducing... #1. Rep. Joe Knollenberg (R-MI) who calls himself an "environmentalist." Yet he's opposed attempts to raise fuel economy standards and increase our use of renewable energy. He also led the effort to stop the EPA from even studying global warming. His lifetime LCV score? Only 7%!

And... #2. Sen. James Inhofe (R-OK) has called global warming "the greatest hoax ever perpetrated on the American people." He is the ranking Republican on the Senate Environment and Public Works Committee, and he's also accepted more than $1 million in contributions from the oil and gas industries. His lifetime LCV score? A measly 5%!

The Dirty Dozen Class of 2008 is here...

Rep. Knollenberg

Sen. Inhofe

... but there's still time to STOP THEM.

Donate to kick off our Dirty Dozen campaign before September 26th.

What will LCV's Action Fund do - with your help - to oust these dirty politicians? We will:

- Create a powerful media presence on television, radio, newspapers and the internet.
- Drive a massive outreach campaign using our decades of experience - including targeted door-to-door canvassing and phone banks.
- Use our signature programs like the Dirty Dozen to let voters know exactly where candidates stand on the big environmental issues like global warming and clean energy.

But we need your help. Make a contribution today and help guarantee we make a strong start - we need to ensure the Dirty Dozen won't stand a chance at the polls next year.

Don't wait. Donate before September 26th. Help us reach our $20,000 goal.

Thank you for your continued commitment.

Sincerely,

Gene Karpinski

Dear Secretary Clinton,

You will be pleased to know that our beloved Rabbi Arthur Schneier, with God's blessing, will mark his 85th birthday on March 20, 2015. We will celebrate this milestone occasion in conjunction with the 125th anniversary of our Synagogue at the Annual Dinner on June 9, 2015, at the Waldorf Astoria, Grand Ballroom. We would be honored to have you extend greetings at this milestone occasion for Rabbi Arthur Schneier and Park East Synagogue.

Rabbi Schneier's indefatigable leadership for over half of a century has benefited not only our community but far beyond our congregation and New York City. He has made Park East Synagogue and the Rabbi Arthur Schneier Park East Day School he founded, beacons of interreligious cooperation that included the visit of Pope Benedict XVI, the first papal visit to a synagogue in the US, the Ecumenical Patriarch Bartholomew, and Chief Rabbis of Israel and Europe.

As founder and president of the Appeal of Conscience Foundation since 1965, Rabbi Schneier's advocacy on behalf of religious freedom, peace, and human rights has been recognized internationally.

You have earned not only Rabbi Schneier's friendship but also that of the members of our Synagogue who respect your leadership in the service of our country. You can be assured of a very warm welcome.

Sincerely yours,

Herman Hochberg

Subject: a troubling decision at Mt St Mary's University

Dear all,

Nancy Sherman from the philosophy department asked that I circulate the below. It concerns the firing of a tenured member of the philosophy department at Mount Saint Mary's University, who is also a GU alum (Phd). The firing was triggered by his opposition to a plan by university administrators to "cull" students from the entering class, in order to improve retention rates. The firing of the phil professor was justified by his breach of his "duty of loyalty." The narrative is provided below.

I will also circulate the petition referenced by Bill Blattner (chair of philosophy) below.

Thanks,

Robin West

Dear Friends,

Not all of you may be aware that Thane Naberhaus, a tenured member of the Philosophy faculty at Mount Saint Mary's University in Emmitsburg, MD, and an alumnus of our PhD program (he wrote his doctoral thesis on Brentano and Husserl under John Brough) was fired yesterday for his role in protesting the policies of the university's new president. The supposed grounds for the firing were that he violated his "duty of loyalty" to MSM. This is beyond reprehensible and will surely result in much litigation.

John Schwenkler, a former member of the MSM faculty and currently at Florida State U, is organizing a public petition drive. I will send around the link, once it's posted, for folks to sign on if they wish.

Grimly,

Bill

"Bunny-Drowning" President Sets Sights on Philosophers

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Philosophers are under attack at Mount St. Mary's University in Emmitsburg, Maryland. The reason appears to be that they questioned the university president's surreptitious attempt to improve his school's retention rate by culling students ahead of the federal reporting deadline.

Thane Naberhaus, until yesterday a tenured associate professor of philosophy at Mount St. Mary's University, was among those fired or demoted for an alleged lack of "loyalty" to the university. The Frederick News-Post reports that Naberhaus and Ed Egan (communications professor and faculty advisor to the student paper) were fired Monday as part of university president Simon Newman 's response to the public-relations disaster following a student newspaper article about his plan to increase student retention rates. The president also removedJoshua Hochschild from his position as dean of the university's College of Liberal Arts and David Rehm from his position as provost. Hochschild and Rehm are also philosophy professors.

Newman's plan was to administer a survey pitched to first-year students as a "valuable tool that will help you discover more about yourself" and then use the results of the survey to cull 20-25 students from the freshman class prior to the deadline for submitting enrollment information to the federal government.

Inside Higher Ed has some coverage of the story here .

The student newspaper, The Mountain Echo , had obtained emails among administrators prior to the survey. From their report:

[Then-provost] Rehm wrote that he was "deeply concerned… on several fronts" about how the survey might be used…

Newman's email continued: "My short term goal is to have 20-25 people leave by the 25th [of Sep.]. This one thing will boost our retention 4-5%. A larger committee or group needs to work on the details but I think you get the objective."…

Rehm shared Newman's email with a larger group comprised of Murry, Associate Provost Leona Sevick, then-Dean Josh Hochschild and Fr. Jim Donohue.

In an email sent at 11:03 p.m. on Aug. 21, Hochschild responded: "As I read this, in response to David's concerns about how and whether survey results are communicated to students, Simon clarified a goal: to dismiss some students."

"This new bit of information is deeply disturbing," Hochschild wrote. "I already thought this survey was ill-conceived on many levels. If one of the intended uses is to identify students to dismiss, I think it is unethical. How can we in good conscience administer this?"

Hochschild's email continued: "The survey's introductory paragraphs almost persuaded me – this could be helpful to students, as part of a project of self-discovery…. But now, it seems that some responses to this survey could lead to drastic decisions. 'There are no wrong answers'?!?!"

"If this is not an anonymous survey, nor even a confidential personality test, but a highly intrusive, and misleadingly framed administrative tool, can we proceed without disclosing to our students' what's at stake?"…

Newman continued to pursue the dismissal of 20-25 first-year students in the face of strong opposition from a small group of faculty and administrators, who were aware of his plan…

Newman said, "This is hard for you because you think of the students as cuddly bunnies, but you can't. You just have to drown the bunnies…put a Glock to their heads."

According to The Frederick News-Post, Naberhaus received a termination letter from Newman on Monday saying that he had violated his "duty of loyalty to [the] University" in unspecified "recent actions" that "clearly justify your termination of employment." Naberhaus, who had tenure, said he was unsure why he was fired and is considering a lawsuit against the university… The letter states Naberhaus has been "designated persona non grata" and is not allowed to visit the campus or attend any university activities or sporting events on Mount property. Doing so "will result in legal proceedings" not specified in the letter.

The supposed "duty of loyalty" that Mount St. Mary's faculty owe the university was not explained in any of the reports, nor is it clear it appears in any faculty contracts, the university's faculty handbook, or other employment documents.

I'll update this post with further information as it becomes available.

UPDATE: Coverage of the story in The Washington Post (via John Schwenkler), The Chronicle of Higher Education, and Inside Higher Ed. IHE's account contains this particular nugget:

Amid all the tensions, 12 faculty members at Mount St. Mary's last week created a campus chapter of the American Association of University Professors. Monday's dismissals brought the chapter's membership down to 10.

On One-Year Anniversary of Signing of the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act, Is Senator Richard Burr Still Trying to Take Credit for the North Carolina Jobs Created by the President's Economic Recovery Plan - After Voting Against It?

Washington D.C. – On the first anniversary of the signing of the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act that the non-partisan Congressional Budget Office found has so far resulted in up to 2.4 million jobs, Americans United for Change wondered if U.S. Senator Richard Burr (R-NC) is still trying to take credit for the jobs created in North Carolina by the President's economic recovery plan -- after harshly criticizing and voting against it. In 2009, AUFC waged a wide scale media campaign and helped lead a major coalition of organizations urging Congress to pass the Recovery Act, which only three Republican Senators stepped forward to support on behalf of their struggling constituents.

- Senator Richard Burr (R-NC) Touted Funds From Stimulus Bill He Opposed. The Hickory Daily Record reports that Burr appeared in Bethlehem, North Carolina, to deliver ARRA funds for a fire station there: This summer, the department applied for and won a $2,008,515 federal grant that will pay for a new 19,000-square-foot fire station. On Friday, U.S. Sen. Richard Burr was in Bethlehem to present the grant to the department.

-Senator Burr slammed the stimulus on Fox News: "This isn't a stimulus package, this is a spending package." [Fox News, 3/1/09]

Tom McMahon, Acting Executive Director, Americans United for Change: "How do we know the President's economic recovery plan is working to create jobs and stabilize the economy? Just ask a Congressional Republican that showed up to a ribbon cutting ceremony for a new bridge, road or rail project or issued a press release praising stimulus money putting more teachers in the classrooms and more cops and fire fighters on the streets in their districts. Over 100 Republican lawmakers, including Richard Burr, have been caught talking out both sides of their mouth – voting against the Recovery Act and then turning around and taking credit for the jobs it created back home, like the construction surrounding a new fire station in Bethlehem. The plain fact of the matter is if Richard Burr had had his way, up to 2.4 million Americans would be without jobs today. Senator Burr does deserve plenty of credit however for being party to the worst rash of political two-facedness in recent memory and enabling the failed Bush-era policies that got us into this mess to begin with."

American Recovery and Reinvestment Act Signed Into Law One Year Ago Today

FLASHBACK: U.S. Rep. Judy Biggert "Applauded" Jobs Created in Illinois by the President's Economic Recovery Plan, Reps. Biggert Kirk, Schock, Johnson, Shimkus, Roskam All "Urged" Governor Quinn to Provide Stimulus Funding for "Green-collar Jobs Programs" in Their Districts – After They Voted Against It

Washington D.C. – On the first anniversary of the signing of the American Recovery and Reinvestment Act that the non-partisan Congressional Budget Office found has so far resulted in up to 2.4 million jobs , Americans United for Change marked the milestone by spotlighting the hypocrisy of Illinois' Republican Representatives in Congress for voting against the President's economic recovery plan and then in the next breathe, demanding stimulus funds for jobs training programs in their districts. In 2009, AUFC waged a wide scale media campaign and helped lead a major coalition of organizations urging Congress to pass the Recovery Act, which only three Republican Senators stepped forward to support on behalf of their struggling constituents.

Subject: Not enough people were paying attention to your tweet that mentioned climate change...

...so I wrote a post about it. Looks like it's going to be popular. (And people are finally starting to retweet it more). -- Judd http://thinkprogress.org/election/2015/04/12/3646143/important-tweet-hillarys-announcement-everyone-pretty-much-ignored/

This Is The Most Important Tweet About Hillary's Announcement And Everyone Pretty Much Ignored It

On Sunday, Hillary Clinton announced she'd run for president in 2016. Her intentions were hardly secret as key staff were already hired and a campaign headquarters was recently established in Brooklyn.

But that didn't stop an avalanche of commentary on Twitter on whether her announcement was "late " and her new campaign logo . But the most important tweet, by her campaign chairman John Podesta*, was mostly ignored.

Podesta's tweet was retweeted about 130 times in the first four hours but none of the retweets were by verified users, other than one ThinkProgress reporter — journalists at major media outlets typically have verified Twitter accounts. The tweet has also not been embedded in a news article by any major publication.

This would make Hillary's campaign the first major presidential campaign ever to make combating climate change a central issue.

Al Gore, who would go onto win a Nobel Prize for his advocacy of climate change, did not make it a key issue of his campaign for president in 2000. The environment section of John Kerry's 2004 website did not mention climate change. (The issue gets one paragraph in a 14-page white paper on the campaign's environmental policies .)

In 2008, Clinton and Obama more readily acknowledged climate change as a serious issue, but is was hardly a central policy issue in a campaign dominated by the fallout from the Iraq war and the emerging economic collapse.

In 2012, with no primary opponent and an opposition party that mostly refused to acknowledge climate science "neither Obama nor Mitt Romney was asked about the issue in any of the presidential debates, and it has not featured prominently in any of the plans for their presidencies." (Ultimately, Obama embraced aggressive action on climate change during his second term including important new rules for power plants and a landmark agreement with China.)

Meanwhile, nearly all Republican candidates won't acknowledge the existence of climate change or — if they do — suggest nothing should be done about it.

The world faces disastrous consequences from climate change in the coming years and ultimately the global response will succeed or fail based on the actions of the world's two largest economies, the United States and China.

Podesta's tweet signals that Clinton plans to make action on climate change a central part of her campaign. If Clinton were to win in 2016 with a mandate to take action on climate, it could save the planet from catastrophic warming.

But what do you think of her new logo?

Disclosure: John Podesta founded the Center For American Progress Action Fund, which is the parent organization of ThinkProgress.*

Confidential! For Your Consideration.

Dear Professor John:

I am in search of an independent evaluator for an application that I would like to make for "full professor" at Columbia College Chicago. You have hosted and inspired my political reporting students and those interested in covering the Washington beat over the years. They all came away with a better understanding of the important role that journalism plays in the Republic ,and I have been indebted to you for taking time to answer their questions.

I don't need a job…I want to hang on to the one I have. Would you evaluate my professional, academic and community service or write a recommendation letter?

Background

I thought I would be dead by now. Thankfully, I am not. Despite almost 20 years of faculty objections, my College is adopting a rank system—giving academic titles i.e. professor, associate professor, assistant professor-- and it wants to "fast track" worthy candidates to full professor in the fall semester.

Deadlines

I have to name my outside evaluator by May 15th and receive the evaluation (after providing the Journalism Department and the College criteria, etc.) by Oct. 1st.

About Teaching at Columbia College Chicago

It is true that I thought about teaching from the time I was a child. But, when I was drawn back to Chicago from my work at CBS New and PBS documentary videos to take care of family, college teaching seemed like the right move.

I looked for the most independent, irreverent, community service-minded Arts and Media College in Chicago. Once I was over my adjustment period, I found that I could really teach students and learn from them, too.

Yes, I made enemies trying to implement more modern practices of gathering, writing, producing and reporting the news and was too controversial to try for a higher position. The years went by and my self-confidence diminished, but I was able to make friends around the college, stood for reform and independence, developed the curriculum (like introducing International Reporting), served as an advisor in developing three schools—Fine & Performing Art, Liberal Arts & Sciences and Media Arts--and I found I had a lot of good ideas to share.

Inspired

I really took to heart the words of Jane Alexandroff, the co-founder of the College—

"Artists, by their very definition, have a responsibility to examine and reflect upon the social fabric, which binds us together as a people and a nation. Artists can be voices of reason, who challenge our most basic assumptions about the health of our society…..Without the voice and visions of individual artists to guide us, we become nothing more than little lost lambs in the meadow."

Can you help me?

With humility and hope…

Rose

Rose Economou

P.S. I have been immobilized by anxiety over the announcement and application…not because I know that I am flawed, but I will hate myself for years to come if I do not apply.

John,

Last e-mail today. Promise.

Met with Beth Jones. Quite an impressive person. (She did share with me that her Arabic language skill is essentially non-existent from disuse. Remember that on Friday several people mentioned that she had Arabic.)

She appeared not to know what job I was talking to her about when we started. I told her only that she was on a "list" of people being discussed for Ambassador to Baghdad.

She is eager to work for the new President. If she is not chosen for Baghdad, for what's it's worth, I think she would be a high quality appointee elsewhere in State or NSC.

Feel free to share this with Hillary and Jim Jones -- or anyone else -- if you wish.

Bill Clinton – "Former president Bill Clinton told African-American church congregations Sunday that he understands the desire to elect the nation's first black president but he urged them to consider his wife's candidacy," reports El Diario La Prensa (NY), Univision Online, OregonLive.com, Diario La Estrella, La Voz (AZ), El Nuevo Herald, and El Paso Times, in the Spanish language version of an AP article. "All my life I have wanted to vote for a woman for president," Clinton told 800 parishioners at the Temple of Praise congregation in Washington. "All my life I have wanted to vote for an African-American for president. ... I wonder why God gave us this dilemma."

Primary Race – "Hillary Rodham Clinton retains her lead among suddenly critical Democratic Party insiders even as Barack Obama builds up his delegate margin with primary and caucus victories across the country, according to a survey by The Associated Press," reports El Nuevo Herald, El Diario La Estrella, OregonLive.com, Houston Chronicle, La Voz (AZ) and El Paso Times, in the Spanish language version of an AP article. "Of the 796 lawmakers, governors and party officials, who are Democratic super-delegates, Clinton had 243 and Obama had 156. That edge was responsible for Clinton's overall advantage in the pursuit of delegates to secure the party's nomination for president. According to the AP's latest tally, Clinton has 1,125 total delegates and Obama has 1,087. A candidate must get 2,205 delegates to capture the nomination" … "The possibility that the democratic candidate to the White House will not be decided until the party's convention this August, has forced Sens. Hillary Clinton and Barack Obama to focus their attention on the super-delegates, a select group that could possibly have the final word," reports El Diario La Prensa (NY), in an EFE wire story. "There's a total of 796 'super-delegates' at stake, and if neither Obama nor Clinton is able to obtain the 2025 necessary delegates to capture the democratic nomination, this number would decide Denver's convention in august."

Dear John:

I know you're busy. When we tried to connect in the fall, I gather the timing wasn't right.

If you still have any interest, let me know. With the passage of the new ESEA/ESSA, the federal landscape has opened up considerably for creative and game changing approaches to educating the hearts and minds of American children. I remain willing to help HRC to move into that opening in whatever way she decides to lead.

Always,
Tim

All,

I wanted to give you an update on the May 21 New York meeting in terms of logistics.

We should have a location confirmed later today.

We are envisioning the meeting starting at noon with lunch and have a number of presentations. The meeting will conclude at 5pm with a cocktail reception for about an hour. This should leave plenty of time for the presentations and Q&A.

Please let me know if you have any concerns.

Beth

Subject: Chelsea Update

Happy New Year! We hope you had a wonderful and restful holiday season with friends and family. The break gave us some time to reflect on what a memorable year 2014 had been.

2014 was a year of great progress and achievement, with a healthy dose of suspense and excitement to go along with it. For example, after Chelsea announced her CGI commitments on the Annual Meeting stage, everyone wondered if she would end up giving birth there too. Thankfully she didn't but less than two days later Chelsea's proudest moment came with the arrival of her and Marc's daughter, Charlotte Clinton Mezvinsky. Her arrival has been a blessing for the whole family (despite its impact on Chelsea and Marc's sleep habits).

Chelsea recently said that she never thought it would be possible for her to care more about the work of the Clinton Foundation, but having a daughter has given her an even deeper understanding of why the Foundation's work is so important, and why it must continue.
Much of the success the Foundation enjoyed in 2014 was supported by the great work of Eric Braverman. Chelsea and her parents are extremely grateful for his contributions and leadership over the last 18 months and wish him the best in his future endeavors. We are all grateful Maura Pally has agreed to be acting CEO of the Foundation through the search and transition process.

I wanted to highlight some of the tremendous strides we made during 2014 across the Foundation's range of work.

In our ongoing efforts to make the Foundation faster, leaner and more effective, 2014 saw the creation of a new metrics team. A key priority for Chelsea, this team will find innovative ways to measure and assess our impact and ultimately use that data to help all of our programs accomplish their goals.

The Clinton Health Access Initiative expanded its anti-diarrheal work and is now providing enough affordable medicine to potentially save the lives of 170,000 children in Nigeria, Kenya, India, and Uganda.

Regarding No Ceilings, our initiative to advance the full participation of women and girls around the world, Chelsea along with her mother helped lead the formation of CHARGE —a 600 million dollar CGI commitment that will strengthen primary education and expand secondary education for 14 million girls around the world. Looking ahead, we're working on announcing the findings of our forthcoming No Ceilings Progress Report and crafting an effort we hope will galvanize a millennial audience around this issue.

Chelsea has also continued to extend the work of the Alliance for a Healthier Generation – our joint anti-obesity initiative with the American Heart Association – to improve the health of the youngest incarcerated population. This month, we celebrate the completion of a successful one-year pilot program that was implemented at nine facilities in Arkansas and California.

As you may remember, we celebrated the 20th anniversary of AmeriCorps this past September. At the CGI Annual Meeting, we announced Making a Service Year Part of American Life, a four-year campaign to encourage 18-28 year-olds to engage in a year of service as a strategy to tackle the nation's most pressing challenges, while empowering and developing the next generation of civic leaders. This initiative will create 30,000 new Service Year opportunities, with the goal of creating one million service opportunities annually by 2023. Early this year, Chelsea will kick off the "Serve a Year" campaign in Los Angeles to continue this work.

Finally, it wouldn't be right to send an update without talking about our work to stop the African Elephant poaching crisis. In 2014, we saw more than a dozen partners added to this fight. From featuring elephants on runway shows at Oscar de la Renta and MADE Fashion Week to TOMS shoes and BRIKA , major fashion and consumer brands have joined our efforts to protect these creatures and educate their consumers. We worked with Kathryn Bigelow to release a short film called "Last Days" that you should all check out . And at the end of 2014, Chelsea and Secretary Clinton hosted an event with Prince William and the Royal Foundation on this topic at a special event during his visit to New York City.

If you made it your New Year's resolution to read all the way to the bottom of these emails, then good for you for sticking to it. We have even more on tap for 2015 from expanding the CGIU platform to a special collaboration between Chelsea, Elmo and Too Small to Fail that will be announced next week. And please, don't hesitate to be in touch with ideas, suggestions, or anything else on your mind.

Best,
Kamyl

Messaging and Talking Points:
Money in Politics for Wisconsin, State Budget Fights

To: Interested Parties
From: David Donnelly, Public Campaign Action Fund
Date: February 22, 2011

As protesters enter their second week fighting the anti-worker and anti-union budget bill in Wisconsin, and as protests spread to state capitals in Ohio, Indiana, and dozens of other states, it is clear that these battles are taking place in the broader context of the role of corporate money in our elections and public policy arenas. What is happening in Wisconsin is not just about unions, and it's not just about Wisconsin. It's about whether corporate special interests and conservative politicians will succeed, in state after state, in their efforts to dismantle, damage, and defund their political opponents.

Overarching frame

Big Oil executives Charles and David Koch and the Chamber of Commerce spent millions to elect Governor Scott Walker and Republicans in Wisconsin, just like they did in other states around the country. Now Walker is paying them back by targeting teachers, nurses, and other public employees in a radical attack on working people in his budget. We won't have government of, by, and for the people if elections are bought and paid for by corporate special interest money.

BACKGROUND

Billionaires Charles and David Koch and Koch Industries were big financial players in electing Governor Scott Walker (R-Wisc.) and Republicans in Wisconsin.

· "State records also show that Koch Industries, their energy and consumer products conglomerate based in Wichita, Kan., was one of the biggest contributors to the election campaign of Gov. Scott Walker of Wisconsin, a Republican who has championed the proposed cuts." [New York Times <http://www.nytimes.com/2011/02/22/us/22koch.html?_r=1 > , 2/22/11]

· "Walker's gubernatorial campaign received $43,000 from the Koch Industries PAC during the 2010 election. That donation was his campaign's second-highest, behind $43,125 in contributions from housing and realtor groups in Wisconsin. The Koch's PAC also helped Walker via a familiar and much-used political maneuver designed to allow donors to skirt campaign finance limits. The PAC gave $1 million to the Republican Governors Association, which in turn spent $65,000 on independent expenditures to support Walker. The RGA also spent a whopping $3.4 million on TV ads and mailers attacking Walker's opponent, Milwaukee Mayor Tom Barrett. Walker ended up beating Barrett by 5 points. The Koch money, no doubt, helped greatly." [Mother Jones <http://motherjones.com/mojo/2011/02/wisconsin-scott-walker-koch-brothers > , 2/17/11]

· Koch Industries contributed $60,000 to the Republican State Leadership Committee (RSLC), a 527 committee whose mission is to elect Republican state lawmakers. According to state campaign finance filings, RSLC spent approximately $1 million to influence elections in Wisconsin in 2010. [Center for Responsive Politics <http://www.opensecrets.org/527s/527cmtedetail_donors.php?url=527cmtedetail_donors.php%3Fcycle%3D2010%26ein%3D050532524&cname=koch&ein=050532524&cycle=2010> , accessed 2/22/11; Wisconsin Government Accountability Board <http://gab.wi.gov/node/1442 > , press release, 11/15/10]

· Gov. Walker's budget also includes a provision that would allow for no-bid sales of state-owned power plants, a lucrative giveaway to energy lobbyists and corporations like Koch Industries. [Senate Bill 11 <http://legis.wisconsin.gov/2011/data/JR1SB-11.pdf> , Section 40, 16.896]

· Far from being concerned about workers, Koch Industries' subsidiaries have been cutting jobs in Wisconsin, while rewarding themselves with huge compensation packages. "At a time when Koch Industries owners David and Charles Koch awarded themselves an extra $11 billion of income from the company, Koch slashed jobs at their Green Bay plant." [Think

Progress <http:// thinkprogress.org/2011/02/18/business-teaparty-wisconsin/> , 2/18/11]

The national, state, and some local Chambers spent millions to elect Gov. Walker and Republicans in Wisconsin.

· Research by Public Campaign Action Fund found that the Republican Governor's Association (RGA) received $395,000 from the Metropolitan Milwaukee Association of Commerce and $1.7 million from the U.S. Chamber of Commerce. The RGA claimed it spent $5 million to elect Gov. Walker. [Public Campaign Action Fund press release <http://www.campaignmoney.org/Wisconsin_Governor_Walker_Payback_Budget> , 2/15/11]

· The U.S. Chamber of Commerce gave nearly $4 million to the Republican State Leadership Committee in 2010. The RSLC spent nearly $1 million to elect Republicans lawmakers in Wisconsin, and $28.8 million nationally. [Center for Responsive Politics <http://www.opensecrets.org/527s/527cmtedetail_contribs.php?ein=050532524&cycle=2010 > , accessed 2/22/11; Wisconsin Government Accountability Board <http://gab.wi.gov/node/1442 > , press release, 11/15/10]

· The statewide chamber, Wisconsin Manufacturers and Commerce, spent at least $2 million to elect Gov. Walker and other Republicans. [Milwaukee Journal-Sentinel <http://www.jsonline.com/news/statepolitics/105404753.html > , 10/20/10]

· The budget shortfall is the result of corporate tax breaks, giveaways to big business, and Republican pet spending priorities like privatized health savings accounts. [Talking Points Memo <http://tpmdc.talkingpointsmemo.com/2011/02/wisconsin-gov-walker-ginned-up-budget-shortfall-to-undercut-worker-rights.php> , 2/14/2011]

It's not just Wisconsin: Nationally, business interests outspent labor by a factor of more than four to one in state elections, and the same interests poured millions into electing other conservative politicians, while breaking disclosure laws.

· In 2010, business interests spent $928 million to influence state elections and ballot measures while organized labor spent just $225 million. [National Institute on Money in State Politics <http://www.followthemoney.org > , accessed 2/22/11]

· In addition to Wisconsin, the RGA spent $128.9 million to elect governors in states around the country, including $9.8 million in Florida to elect Rick Scott and $11 million in Ohio to elect John Kasich. [Republican Governor's Association <http://www.rga.org> press releases, accessed 2/22/11; Center for Responsive Politics <http://www.opensecrets.org/527s/527cmtedetail.php?cycle=2010&ein=113655877> , accessed 2/22/11]

· A well-connected Virginia lobbyist will head the RSLC. "Chris Jankowski, currently a state Capitol lobbyist for automakers, cigarette manufacturers and car-title lenders, is becoming the president of the Republican State Leadership Committee." [Richmond Times-Dispatch <http://www2.timesdispatch.com/news/2011/feb/13/tdmet04-notes-from-the-capitol-ar-839214/ > , 2/13/11]

· The Maine Ethics Commission handed down the largest fine in its history against the RSLC after it spent $400,000 attacking state Democrats while breaking state campaign finance disclosure laws. [Bangor Daily News <http://new.bangordailynews.com/2011/02/17/politics/gop-group-fined-26k-for-campaign-violations/> , 2/17/11]

NOTABLE QUOTABLES

· "I grew up quite poor in western Maine. The only reason I have the chance to serve the people of this great state is because of public financing. The great thing about public financing is that I am entirely beholden to the best interests of my people, not to the Corporatocracy that has taken over our democratic Republic. I am leaving today to drive to Madison. I am not coming to challenge lawmakers in Wisconsin or tell folks how to run their state. I am coming because if the levee breaks in Madison, we are all going to be flooded." – Maine State Rep. Diane Russell [AFL-CIO Blog <http:// blog.aflcio.org/2011/02/21/maine-state-rep-wis-war-is-about-every-worker/> , 2/21/11]

· "What Mr. Walker and his backers are trying to do is to make Wisconsin — and eventually, America — less of a functioning democracy and more of a third-world-style oligarchy. And that's why anyone who believes that we need some counterweight to the political power of big money should be on the demonstrators' side." – Paul Krugman, Nobel Prize winner and New York Times columnist [New York Times <http://www.nytimes.com/2011/02/21/opinion/21krugman.html > , 2/20/11]

Hello, John -

I hope you are well and having fun. Big job you've got.

I cook dinner 4-5 times each winter-spring for the House majority leader here and her 12-15 closest friends. These are the smart, progressive women in the Illinois legislature. Next is May 5.

I'd be happy to "poll" them on any questions the campaign might have for such a group. I can also do this year-round . . you know how women love a man who cooks.

If this might be helpful, please let me know what you'd like me to do.

Linnea is wildly supportive of Hillary . .

I would be, too, if she'd declare "no WS $."

Please take good care of yourself!

Greg

Recirculating both the fact sheet and op-ed reflecting edits and comments from Jake, Nikki, and Joel. In answer to research: changed 20 to 40, and Trevor can provide calculations based on EIA data, if reporters need it, on the Mexico/Canada trade point. It isn't written up neatly in one place online, unfortunately.

Joel, we pumped up the climate impacts but in discussing with Jake decided we do still need to address why she's making her position known, when she has previously said she will wait for the President to make a decision. Added a line about wanting to let voters know where she stands, and added a more expansive graf about making the US the leader in fighting climate change and becoming a clean energy superpower. Nipped and tucked elsewhere to keep the word count down.

Knowing we are still working out rollout timing - comms, policy, political, do you clear these to go forward to the book?

Thanks all.

Team,

Attaching a draft HRC op-ed which uses opposition to KXL as a pivot to talk about a plan for broad investment in modernizing our energy infrastructure and forging a climate compact between the US, Mexico, and Canada. These versions reflect initial edits and comments from the policy team, JDP, and Nikki.

The current thinking is to have HRC address this in her meeting with the building trades on Wednesday and roll out the fact sheet and op-ed in conjunction with that. Please send edits and clearances from comms, policy, research, and political to me, Trevor, Ben, and Pete no later than 10 am tomorrow so we can get this to HRC with plenty of time for her review and clearance.

Thanks,

Kristina

John,
With regard to thimerosal, I have one simple question, why do we ever want to inject any amount of mercury into our bodies, much less a pregnant woman? The medical experts, CDC, ACOG, etc. claim that thimerosal is fine and it is not a risk because it is present in “trace amounts”, but what does that mean? Can they be more specific in clarifying what constitutes “trace amounts?” Clearly, we all agree that there is some level of mercury which they advise against. Where is that line?

We already took thimerosal out of childhood vaccines, we just need to take it out of flu shots too, and we can offer the same vaccines in single-dose shots which do not have thimerosal.

Now, I will make you a bet.. I bet that taking thimerosal out of flu shots that we give to pregnant women will reduce the number of children afflicted with mercury poisoning, autism and other neurological disorders. If I am right, we will improve the health of one million kids/year and lower health care costs by hundreds of billions of dollars over the next decade. If I am wrong, well… we are no worse off because pregnant women didn’t get thimerosal, and so I’m wrong. I’ll buy you lunch.

“We found out that the Thimeresol would be toxic down to – not grams, not mg’s, not mcgs, but nano grams – parts per billion – which was almost unbelieveable. This was published in the American Journal Medical Society, in the New York Academy Sciences and in the Journal For the Chemical Speciality Manufactures Association and it didn’t make wave, there wasn’t even a ripple – no one seemed to care.” – Dr Frank P Engley PhD – Blue Ribbon Panel Member 1948 AMA meeting regarding Thimeresol’s concerns

John,

With 91,732 ballots counted, we lead by 4,046 votes – an insurmountable lead.

This victory was truly a team effort, and it belongs to all of you who volunteered to knock on doors or make phone calls, tweeted about our campaign, contributed money, and spoke to your friends and neighbors about how important this race is. I want to specifically thank Democracy for America and it's more than 1 million members nationwide, who were helpful from the beginning to end of our campaign.

Together we sent a message that the voters of this district value a lifetime of service to the community more than a lifetime of serving oneself.

Together, we sent a message that this election could not be bought by Super PACs and right-wing millionaires and billionaires. My opponent's donors wasted more than $5 million, through his campaign and Super PAC, to try to replace my progressive voice with someone who would do their bidding. But although we were outspent 2:1, they were no match for the more than 10,000 donors who funded my campaign.

Thank you.

We won this together, and together we will continue to fight to make sure that the voices of the most needy are not drowned out by the voices of those who pay to make theirs loudest in Washington. We will fight to raise the minimum wage, to increase Social Security benefits, to make sure each and every child receives the educational equity and excellence they deserve, and to respect the civil rights of all people no matter what they look like, where they're from, how they worship, or who they love.

We will continue fighting for these things because they are the values that make our nation, and this District, great. And you can count on me to be with you in that fight, because I'm not going anywhere.

Thank You.

ECONOMIC CRISIS MAKES "RUBINOMICS" IRRELEVANT

Progressive Leader Weighs In On Obama's New Economic Team: "It's not the personnel, it's the policy"

WASHINGTON – Responding to concerns that President-elect Obama's new economic leadership team is dominated by people who played a role in creating the current crisis, Campaign for America's Future co-director Robert Borosage said that deepening economic emergency makes "Rubinomics" irrelevant. Borosage said that today's announcement is a key step toward enacting a bold economic recovery plan.

Many progressives are concerned that the president-elect's economic team is dominated by allies of former Treasury Secretary Robert Rubin, who opposed the regulation of derivatives and other measures blamed for the economic crisis. Rubin is senior counselor and director of Citigroup Inc., which has just received a $20 billion cash infusion and hundreds of billions of dollars in loan guarantees from taxpayers.

STATEMENT OF ROBERT BOROSAGE

It's not the personnel, it's the policy. And on this, Obama has been clear. He's announced a massive recovery plan based on putting people to work with public investment in areas vital to our future.

The crisis we face makes Rubinomics irrelevant. Deficit spending must go up, finance must be re-regulated, trade imbalances must be reduced and manufacturing can no longer be scorned.

Obama is choosing experienced hands for the crisis, trusting that their experience does not impede the new thinking needed to get us out of this hole. He'll set the direction. And so far, he's on course.

Subject: Unthinkable

Friend,

It's bad enough that Bruce Rauner already proposed lowering the minimum wage, but eliminating it altogether? That's unthinkable.

There's a reason no major-party gubernatorial candidate in modern Illinois history has ever openly advocated for eliminating the minimum wage before now:

The minimum wage is a basic protection for workers that's been in place for nearly 80 years. Without it, there's nothing stopping big business and corporations from lowering wages all the way to the floor.

This is a big deal.

Will you chip in $5 or more right now to help get the word out on this huge story?

"Rauner admits he once favored eliminating minimum wage." That's the Sun-Times headline I woke up to this morning.

I have no doubt that Rauner is going to try and walk this back or cover it up, but we have him on tape.

This is the kind of thing that could completely change this race.

We can hold his feet to the fire, and make sure every voter knows exactly where Bruce Rauner really stands on this.

Campaigns can turn on moments like this, but we can't let this opportunity slip by. Chip in $5 or more to help stop this guy right now:

John has been awhile.. President Clinton's administration to be exact. If you recall I work for John Catsimatidis, wealthy New York businessman and close to Fr. Alex.

Just to refresh, Catsimatidis is a billionaire here in the City whose wealth is derived from real estate, refineries, supermarkets and airlines, and these days he also has a radio program which airs on Sunday mornings. Details below.

I am not quite sure how or if you can help with this, but John told me to contact you. As you can see from the attached list I have call-in guests from every walk of life and elected office, but I have not been able to get anyone from the administration, largely because I don't know anyone from the administration.

I have calls into almost every cabinet office and agency but so far no luck and I would seriously like to balance this program with a few representatives of President Obama.

We tape during the week at the convenience of the guests. The program airs on Sunday mornings. To everyone's surprise the program is growing in popularity.

So I will leave it at this. If there is anyway you can help, or extend some credibility to his call, it would be greatly appreciated.

Reviving this thread now that we're tracking a substance abuse rollout for the first half of next week. Attaching the latest version of the oped, which reflects new policy and references the recent White House announcement on targeted law enforcement and public health grants. This is identical to the oped this group cleared on 2 weeks ago, except for the sentences that I've flagged with comments in the attached, and for some small edits to keep the word count down.

As this has already been much-discussed and edited, please respond by 11am Friday with any further comments or edits so we can get this to HRC for her review.

Thanks everybody!

Here is my suggestion for four full points:

That's why I'm releasing a comprehensive strategy [LINK] to confront the drug addiction crisis head-on. My plan sets four goals: first, ensuring every American family has access to affordable and effective treatments; second, ensuring that our mental health parity laws are fully enforced so that insurance practices are not a barrier to substance abuse treatment; third, ensuring all first responders have access to naloxone, which stops overdoses from becoming fatal; and fourth, requiring that all health-care providers receive training in recognizing substance use disorders and consult a prescription drug monitoring program before providing opiates.

Does this work for everyone?

Hi all -

Sorry I was out of pocket for a few hours. On a flight now to raise $$ for all of us in Oklahoma - the things we do!!

Anyhow, here is the deal:

(1) The American Academy of Pediatrics came out with a strong policy statement in 2011 that every child/teenager should be screened for substance abuse disorders when they visit the doctor for their annual child check up or for an accute care visit in which it might be suspected. HRC has a long history of working with AAP and supporting their efforts to do more screenings. When she was First Lady, she worked on the Newborn

Hearing Screening to make sure all babies get hearing screenings, and in the last several years she has pushed for and supported the AAP's effort to screen young kids for symptoms of "toxic stress." This is not "mandatory," but it is part of prevention and wellness and it is about supporting the AAP in making this happen by raising awareness, making sure pediatricians get reimbursed for their time in doing these screenings, etc. I have tried to clarify with edits to the speech, pasted below and attached.

(2) On Mandy's question about mental health parity, I have added a line.

(3) On Karen's question of whether we reached out to urban leaders, we talked to a number of policy experts who serve urban communities. Maya is going to work with political to be sure we do political outreach to leaders in next 48 hours.

(4) On Karen's suggestion, that she alludes to problems in her own family - I have modified accordingly.

(5) On Nick's question about specialized care, we are good with it as Kristina noted - but let me know if you have further concerns.

I am also attaching our final fact sheet. If all are good, we should get her this draft op-ed together with the fact sheet. Let me know if you have more questions or concerns.

Thanks,

Ann

DRAFT substance abuse op-ed

WC: 822 words

I was on my first trip to New Hampshire this spring, in a Keene bakery, when a retired doctor spoke up. I had just announced I was running for president, and I had traveled to Iowa and New Hampshire to hear directly from voters about their concerns, their hopes, and their vision for the future. He said his biggest worry was the rising tide of heroin addiction in the state, the result of a wave of prescription drug abuse. He said hospitals were seeing more babies born addicted, that police officers were responding to more overdoses, that families were being torn apart.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

To be candid, I didn't expect what came next. In several states, this issue crept up again and again – from so many people, from all walks of life, in small towns and big cities.

In Iowa, from Davenport to Council Bluffs, people spoke to me about meth and prescription drugs, and scores of lives upended. In South Carolina, a lawyer spoke movingly about the holes in the community left by generations of black men who ended up imprisoned for non-violent drug offenses rather than getting the treatment they needed.

These stories shine light on some harrowing statistics. Nearly 23 million Americans suffer from addiction, but in 2014, only 2.5 million were able to receive treatment at a specialized facility. Fifty-two million Americans over the age of 12 have abused prescription drugs, including one in four teenagers. In 2014, more Americans died from overdoses than car crashes.

Enough is enough. It's time we recognize as a nation that we have a quiet epidemic on our hands. Plain and simple, drug addiction is a disease, not a moral failing—and we must treat it as such.

It's time we recognize as a nation that there are gaps in our health care system that allow too many sufferers to go without care—and invest substantially more in prevention and treatment.

It's time we recognize as a nation that our state and federal prisons, where 65 percent of inmates meet the medical criteria for substance use disorders, are no substitute for drug treatment—and reform our criminal justice system.

That's why I'm releasing a comprehensive strategy [LINK] to confront the drug addiction crisis head-on. My plan sets four goals: first, ensuring every American family has access to affordable and effective treatments; second, ensuring that we work with pediatricians to be sure that every child and teenager is educated about and screened for substance use disorders as part of their annual doctor's visit, just as we do for hearing, eyesight, developmental delays and so much more; third, ensuring all first responders have access to naloxone, which stops overdoses from becoming fatal; and fourth, requiring that all health-care providers receive training in recognizing substance use disorders and consult a prescription drug monitoring program before providing opiates.

Achieving these goals won't be easy. It's going to take real commitment from all corners—law enforcement, doctors, insurance companies, schools, and governments. That's why my plan starts by increasing funding for the Substance Abuse Prevention and Treatment Block Grant by 25 percent, so states and localities have more resources to work with, and changing rules that arbitrarily limit how many patients can be treated with medication assisted treatment, a proven intervention for opiate addiction. I will also direct the federal government to re-evaluate Medicare and Medicaid payment practices, to remove obstacles to reimbursement for patients seeking help and promote greater coordination of care. And I will make sure that our mental health parity laws are fully enforced so that insurance practices are not a barrier to substance abuse treatment.

But we can't stop there. As President, I will do everything I can to partner with states and communities across America to meet the four goals—treatment, prevention, overdose intervention, and improved prescriber practices. We'll ask states to design ambitious plans for tackling these four goals using the programs that make most sense for their citizens' needs and challenges. In return for strong plans to address the substance abuse crisis, the federal government will draw on a new $5 billion fund to help states meet their goals.

Every town I've visited so far in this campaign has stories of families upended by drug addiction. But across the country, I've also heard about second chances. The young mother who overcame addictions to alcohol and heroin so her son would never see her with a drink or a drug in her hand. The man who served 11 years in prison who is now serving others through a prison ministry.

They all say the same thing: no matter how much time has passed, no matter how different their lives are today, they're all still in recovery. It's a process—one that began when a family member, a friend, a doctor, a police officer extended a hand to help. As one New Hampshire woman said, "We're not bad people trying to get good, we're sick people who deserve to get well."

There are 23 million Americans suffering from addiction. There are untold millions more. No one is untouched – we all have family and friends who are affected. We can't afford to stay on the sidelines any longer—because when families are strong, America is strong. Through improved treatment, prevention, and training, we can end this quiet epidemic once and for all.

On the screening point, will let policy get into details, but it's the major pillar of the 'prevention' goal. schools and doctors regularly screen for all sorts of diseases, and substance abuse screening /= random drug testing.

On the "specialized facilities," the stat comes from the NIH's National Institute on Drug Abuse and includes all facilities licensed or certified by state substance abuse agencies to provide treatment. So think it's easy to answer Politifact when they try to get cute.

I talked to Marlon today about this. Naturally we should not be making this decision in a policy vacuum or just because we are concerned about a story of her changing her mind or taking on Obama. It is so much bigger than this. Getting on the wrong side of Labor on the only issue they care about has ramifications on the ground in these early states. I say we suck it up and be as definitive as possible from the beginning that we don't like these deals. We will be right with voters and right with labor. We get no integrity gold star for staying pure on this issue because of one line if friggin Hard Choices or because this is a key issue for a lame duck president.

I am for three because it sends the strongest signal not only Labor but to where voters are on trade. They feel they always get the raw end of the deal. I am less concerned about historical blowback on her past position than this issue eating us alive for being on the wrong side and giving Progressives a real reason to try and push someone more weighty into the primary. There are no other issues that Labor cares about. This is it for them and they actually have voters on their side.

American families, not trade for trade's sake.

There are a number of pivotal questions to be decided in the coming months: from improving labor rights, the environment, public health, and access to life-saving medicines; to cracking down on currency manipulation and unfair competition by state-owned enterprises; to opening new opportunities for our family farms and small businesses to export their products and services overseas. Getting these things right will go a long way toward ensuring that a final agreement will be a net plus for everyday Americans.

We also have to get dispute settlement provisions right. So-called "investor-state dispute settlement," or ISDS, lets individual companies bring cases to enforce trade agreements. In the past, ISDS has benefited some American companies by letting them challenge unfair actions by foreign governments. But as I warned in my book, Hard Choices, we shouldn't allow multinational corporations to use ISDS to undermine legitimate health, social, economic, and environmental regulations, as Philip Morris has tried to do in Australia.

So I'll be watching closely to see how negotiations develop.

As for process, I called Senator Wyden. I told him I believe that President Obama should have the authority to negotiate a good TPP deal that delivers for the middle class, but I don't support extending that authority for years beyond this administration and this trade agreement. [And therefore I can't support his bill.]

3. The Robbyoption would lean more heavilyand decisivelyagainst TPA and TPP.

I called Senator Wyden. I told him I can't support his bill. I don't support a broad grant of trade authority that extends for years beyond this administration and this trade agreement. I think this President should have the authority to drive a hard bargain on TPP, but this broader bill doesn't work from my perspective.

As for TPP, I'm going to set a very high bar. It has to pass two tests: First, does it protect American workers, raise wages and create more good jobs at home than it displaces? And second, does it also strengthen our national security? If the agreement falls short of these tests, we should be willing to walk away. The goal is greater prosperity for American families, not trade for trade's sake.

There are a number of pivotal questions to be decided in the coming months: from improving labor rights, the environment, public health, and access to life-saving medicines; to cracking down on currency manipulation and unfair competition by state-owned enterprises; to opening new opportunities for our family farms and small businesses to export their products and services overseas. Getting these things right will go a long way toward ensuring that a final agreement will be a net plus for everyday Americans.

We also have to get dispute settlement provisions right. So-called "investor-state dispute settlement," or ISDS, lets individual companies bring cases to enforce trade agreements. In the past, ISDS has benefited some American companies by letting them challenge unfair actions by foreign governments. But as I warned in my book, Hard Choices, we shouldn't allow multinational corporations to use ISDS to undermine legitimate health, social, economic, and environmental regulations, as Philip Morris has tried to do in Australia.

So I'll be watching closely to see how negotiations develop.

Warren's 'no' doesn't deter faithful in Iowa (Boston Globe)
By Jessica Meyers
February 5, 2015
The Boston Globe

FAIRFIELD, Iowa -- Not far from this town's transcendental meditation school, on the second floor of the used bookstore, a mostly white-haired group plotted Elizabeth Warren's presidential campaign.

Carole Simmons, a retired researcher who hosted the gathering of Warren devotees last weekend, read instructions from the state's new Run Warren Run headquarters.

"We're supposed to take pictures and tweet," she said. "Who's good at tweeting?"

Iowa is on the front line of the draft-Warren movement, a $1.25 million effort funded by the liberal groups MoveOn.org and Democracy for America, which have chosen the country's first caucus state as a cornerstone for their push.

This "house party" -- one of 11 in Iowa and more than 200 nationwide last weekend -- embodies the effort: scrappy, earnest, ambitious.

And, quite possibly, pointless.

The shadow campaign's greatest challenge is Warren herself. She has repeatedly stated that she will not mount a White House bid, so these supporters are left to prove they are something more than a doting fan club of wishful thinkers -- political freelancers who are dedicating numerous hours to organize ground troops and raise large sums of money in the name of a noncandidate.

"Elizabeth Warren is a ridiculous long shot, but you can call that a sense of desperation," said Patrick Bosold, a 65-year-old software engineer at the meeting who made a retching sound to explain his distaste for corporate interests. "We are not being terribly politically realistic, and I don't care."

Warren's national profile has shot up in recent months, after she knocked out President Obama's pick for a key Treasury Department post and tried to block a major spending bill because she objected to a provision that eased financial regulations. Her laserlike focus on income inequality and corporate greed have triggered a groundswell of liberal support and pleas from some of her biggest backers that she run for president.

It does not seem to matter that Warren has said she will complete her Senate term, which ends in January 2019. Her refusals have only prompted more organized draft efforts.

Ready for Warren, a super PAC that can spend unlimited funds, was launched in July and has raised nearly $99,000. The political action committee for MoveOn.org, an advocacy group started in 1998 to defend President Bill Clinton from impeachment, pledged $1 million to a Run Warren Run movement in December. Democracy for America, a political action committee founded by former Vermont governor Howard Dean, has vowed to assist with at least $250,000.

But many Iowa Democrats take her multiple refusals at face value. She visited the state only once last year, to stump for a Senate candidate, Bruce Braley. He lost. No prominent Iowa advisers are providing their services. Party officials have yet to come forward and endorse a potential Warren candidacy.

"It's good that people are organizing and taking action, but I can't imagine this is fruitful," said Scott Brennan, a former Iowa Democratic Party chairman who stepped down in January. "There's not a point."

The last effective presidential draft movement took place more than a decade ago, when "Draft Clark" supporters helped encourage an eager Wesley Clark to run in the 2004 race. He backed out several months later and endorsed John F. Kerry, the Massachusetts Democrat.

The young faces in the draft movement's state headquarters in Des Moines believe Warren will prove the next success.

Iowa's Run Warren Run headquarters opened in an office warehouse space last Thursday with a crowd of about 30 people, a potluck that consisted largely of prepackaged sweets and unwavering assurance that activists could sway the Massachusetts senator.

One of the five paid staffers recruited his father to help with telephone calls. They encouraged visitors to fill out postcards for Warren and promised to run a "100 percent positive campaign," despite a general distrust of presumed primary front-runner Hillary Rodham Clinton and her support from Wall Street interests. In the 2008 Iowa caucus, Clinton came in third.

The embryonic Warren movement, only two months in, has tapped into a deeper discontent with the Democratic Party's agenda and given liberals a rare sounding board.

"What we are trying to do is not just draft Elizabeth Warren, but we are trying to model what a Democratic campaign should look like," said Charles Chamberlain, Democracy for America's executive director.

The Iowa garage operation represents one piece of a sophisticated national fund-raising effort that could benefit the groups, even as it helps Warren.

A Run Warren Run website asks donors to click on boxes from $5 to $1,500 and sends the money to MoveOn.org's coffers.

The group, whose members voted to support the draft, has not created a separate pot for the funds it gets from the Warren recruitment efforts. Ilya Sheyman, executive director of MoveOn.org Political Action, declined to discuss how much the group has raised off the Warren brand but said those who contribute "can see the resources being invested by grass-roots donors are going to the service of drafting Elizabeth Warren for president."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Warren has ignored the latest campaign, though her attorney wrote to the Federal Election Commission last year, making it clear she did not "authorize, endorse, or otherwise approve" of Ready for Warren.

A Warren spokeswoman said the senator does not support MoveOn.org's and Democracy for America's fund-raising efforts, either. Ready for Warren, because it can raise unlimited money, has different legal requirements. But her office declined to explain why she has not formally distanced herself from the latest effort.

MoveOn.org has brought on two senior advisers to guide its national draft-Warren campaign. A New Hampshire office will open in coming days. And more than 90 artists signed a letter on Tuesday encouraging a Warren bid, including celebrities Susan Sarandon, Mark Ruffalo, and Ed Norton.

They don't seem to notice that Warren keeps saying no.

"We will show her so much momentum she will get into the race," said Blair Lawton, the campaign's Iowa field director.

Advocates note it took a similar effort to draw Warren into the 2012 Senate campaign in Massachusetts.

A Bloomberg Politics/Des Moines Register poll last week showed Clinton receiving 56 percent of the vote from Iowa Democrats and Warren taking second place at 16 percent, up from 10 percent in October.

The half-frozen Des Moines River separates the Run Warren Run headquarters from Ready for Hillary's Iowa office near the gilded State Capitol. Clinton supporters, buoyed by Warren's refusals, don't consider the draft campaign much of a threat.

"Someone is spending a lot of money to push a person that doesn't want to be pushed, so what is their mission?" said Bonnie Campbell, a former Iowa attorney general, gubernatorial candidate, and current Clinton backer.

Ready for Hillary, a super PAC with which Campbell volunteers, was launched two years ago and has raised nearly $13 million, 130 times that of Ready for Warren.

Two hours away, at the exit with a hand-written "Dump Obama" sign, the Fairfield group sat above a cafe that offered organic elk burgers and they devised a plan.

They decided on an open house at the public library, considered finding local leaders to discuss their support, and talked about a weekend celebration. To celebrate what wasn't exactly clear -- as host Carole Simmons pointed out.

"We should have a party," she said, "when she decides to run."

Busy March for Hillary Clinton could presage campaign launch (MSNBC)
By Alex Seitz-Wald
February 4, 2015
MSNBC

After months of relative quiet, Hillary Clinton is pressing ahead with preparations for a return to the campaign trail, ramping up her public activity in March ahead of an almost certain campaign launch.

Clinton has only one public appearance scheduled for February – a paid speech at a Silicon Valley conference for women – but will significantly expand her profile in March with at least four appearances. First up, she'll receive an award at the 30th anniversary gala of Emily's List, the powerful Democratic group that works to get more pro-choice women elected to office. Emily's List's founder Ellen Malcolm co-chaired Clinton's 2008 presidential campaign and the group has been one the former secretary of state's key outside allies. The March 3 event will give her an opportunity to speak about need to get more more women in elected office – perhaps even the White House.

Next, Clinton will be inducted into the Irish America Hall of Fame at a ceremony in New York City on March 16, the day before St. Patrick's Day. Clinton is not Irish – her parents are of English, Welsh, Scottish, and French descent – but as first lady, she played a key role in the peace process in Northern Ireland. "She galvanized women's groups on both sides by meeting with them, shaping their agenda and making sure they always had a friend in the U.S. administration," said Irish America co-founder Niall O'Dowd. Two of her potential Democratic primary opponents, Vice President Biden and former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley, along with her husband Bill Clinton, are previously inductees.

After that, Clinton heads to Atlantic City, New Jersey for a paid speech on March 19 to the American Camp Association, an industry group of summer camp professionals. Four days later, she's back in Washington to present a journalism award named in honor of Robin Toner, the first woman to be named national political reporter for The New York Times.

What Clinton does next is the key question for Clinton watchers and Democrats alike.

People close to Clinton say her plans have not changed since April was first identified as likely launch window for a campaign, and that her preparation is pressing ahead full steam. Some Clinton allies, however, say the presumed Democratic front-runner might wait until as late as July to formally announce her campaign. They say she might also opt to form an exploratory committee or PAC in the spring, and then wait until Summer for a formal launch. Clinton's strength buys her time, but some Democrats fear she risks appearing like she's taking the Democratic primary system for granted if she waits too long.

Meanwhile, outside groups are keeping up enthusiasm for the likely candidate. The pro-Clinton super PAC Ready for Hillary this week reported raising more than $740,000 in the last quarter, for a total haul of more than $12.9 million since it was created two years ago.

Other Democratic 2016 hopefuls are also ramping up activity. Vermont Sen. Bernie Sanders will make two appearances at a progressive festival in Pennsylvania this weekend, before speaking on his economic plan at the Brookings Institution in Washington Monday. Later this month, he'll make three-day swing through Iowa.

Former Maryland Gov. Martin O'Malley has a busy March as well, with appearances at Democratic events in South Carolina, Kansas, New Hampshire, and Iowa. His O'Say Can You See PAC, which he is using the lay the groundwork for a presidential run, reported raising more than $191,000 in the last quarter.

Top White House Official to Leave for Emerging Hillary Clinton Campaign (WSJ)
By Peter Nicholas and Carol Lee
February 4, 2015
Wall Street Journal

Another top aide to President Barack Obama will be leaving the White House to join Hillary Clinton 's would-be presidential campaign, people familiar with the matter say, the latest example of the two major camps within the Democratic Party coalescing behind the former Secretary of State's likely candidacy.

Jennifer Palmieri will leave her job as White House communications director for a comparable role with Mrs. Clinton, these people said.

The move locks in place another top position on Mrs. Clinton's campaign team, should she choose to run.

Ms. Palmieri has connections to both the Obama and Clinton worlds, having worked in Bill Clinton's White House in the 1990s. She is also close to another figure who bridges both the Obama and Clinton worlds: John Podesta.

Mr. Podesta is currently a senior adviser to the president. He is due to leave the White House this month and to later join the Clinton team, perhaps in the role of campaign chairman, people familiar with events have said.

The earliest Ms. Palmieri will leave is March, a White House official said Wednesday. The White House declined to say what Ms. Palmieri will do next. Mrs. Clinton's office didn't respond to a request for comment.

Mrs. Clinton has given no timetable for when she'll announce her candidacy, but people familiar with the matter expect her to jump in sometime between April and July. Before her formal announcement, she might set up a presidential exploratory committee, which would enable her to raise campaign funds to help cover travel and other expenses.

Ms. Palmieri has strong relations with the press corps, a potential asset to a Clinton team whose dealings with the media in the 2008 campaign were frosty.

Ms. Palmieri didn't serve in Mr. Obama's 2008 campaign and is one of the few outsiders to gain influence in a White House that prizes loyalty. She was tasked, in part, with improving White House relations with the press and is seen as a fair broker between the administration and the press corps.

Mr. Obama particularly has sought her input on media relations issues that require knowledge of precedent, given her experience in the Clinton administration.

The addition of Ms. Palmieri rounds out the top ranks of Mrs. Clinton's emerging campaign organization.

Others expected to play key roles are Joel Benenson, who was Mr. Obama's campaign pollster; Jim Margolis, a media adviser to Mr. Obama's campaigns; Cheryl Mills, who served as a counselor to Mrs. Clinton in the State Department and worked in her husband's White House; and Philippe Reines, a trusted confidante of Mrs. Clinton.

The White House also announced Wednesday that Dan Pfeiffer, one of Mr. Obama's top advisers, will depart in early March. Mr. Pfeiffer has been part of Mr. Obama's senior team of advisers since the 2008 presidential campaign.

Top White House aide Palmieri to leave for Clinton 2016 team (WAPO)
By Juliet Eilperin, Anne Gearan and Dan Balz
February 4, 2015
The Washington Post

White House communications director Jennifer Palmieri will leave the administration this spring, according to individuals familiar with the decision, to serve as communications director for Hillary Rodham Clinton's likely presidential campaign.

A White House official confirmed Palmieri will leave — perhaps as early as next month — but would not comment on her next job. Palmieri's departure comes the same day White House senior adviser Dan Pfeiffer announced he would leave in March.

The White House official, who asked not to be identified in order to discuss personnel matters, said the president and White House chief of staff Denis McDonough were debating how to restructure Pfeiffer's role, and planned to bring on new aides to help implement Obama's agenda for the remainder of his term. The aide said that while both departures were "a major loss," Obama had a history of recruiting skilled replacements when jobs became vacant.

"We need energized, new people to do that," the aide said, referring to the president's remaining agenda.

Clinton, for her part, is revamping her communications and press strategy -- a minefield for a candidate with a deep distrust of the news media. Relations between the 2008 White House contender and the press became toxic and suspicious, and strategists have expected Clinton to hire several campaign spokespeople this time who come with established good relationships with reporters.

A senior Democratic strategist supporting Clinton, who requested anonymity because Clinton has not yet said she is running, said Palmieri emerged last month as the leading candidate to head the former secretary of state's campaign communications operation. For an image-conscious campaign where men have been identified for nearly all the top positions, according to the strategist, the team very much wanted a widely-respected woman in the lead role.

Recent discussions among the Clinton cadre have centered on ways she can communicate through the political press and in spite of it, strategists said, including ways she can exploit social media outlets that did not exist when she ran in 2008.

First word of an April exploratory committee could come via Twitter or another platform, strategists said, although all such plans remain up in the air.

Obama pollster Joel Benenson, now serving as a chief Clinton adviser, is leading some of the discussions about communications strategy and other topics, two people familiar with recent meetings said. Also under discussion: Whether the campaign headquarters would be in White Plains, N.Y., near Clinton's home in suburban Chappaqua, or in New York City. White Plains is out, Manhattan or Brooklyn are in, strategists said.

Reports: Obama aide to work for Clinton campaign (USAT)
By David Jackson
February 5, 2015
USA Today

White House Communications Director Jennifer Palmieri is leaving to work for Hillary Rodham Clinton's probable presidential campaign, according to multiple news reports.

The Wall Street Journal describes Palmieri's switch as "the latest example of the two major camps within the Democratic Party coalescing behind the former Secretary of State's likely candidacy."

It's the second major staff departure announced this week at President Obama's White House, a common development in the last two years of an administration. Senior Adviser Dan Pfeiffer is also leaving the administration, Obama said Wednesday.

White House counselor John Podesta has also announced he is leaving, and is also expected to join Clinton's expected campaign.

From the Associated Press:

"No firm date has been selected for Palmieri's departure, but she'll remain in her current role for a number of weeks, said a White House official. Pfeiffer plans to leave in mid-March. The official said Obama and chief of staff Denis McDonough would seek to fill the openings with an eye toward bringing in 'new, energized staff with fresh ideas and new perspectives.'

"A veteran media strategist known for her genial approach to dealing with reporters, Palmieri served in the Clinton administration and worked as a spokeswoman for North Carolina Sen. John Edwards during his presidential campaign. She was an executive at the Center for American Progress think tank before joining Obama's staff at the start of his second term."

Key Obama official moving to Clinton (Hill)
By Justin Sink
February 4, 2015
The Hill

White House communications director Jennifer Palmieri is planning to leave the White House later this spring, and is expected to take a role in Hillary Clinton's presidential campaign.

The announcement of her departure comes on the same day that Dan Pfeiffer, a senior adviser to the president who previously held the communications director job, announced he would leave the administration by mid-March.

Palmieri, who served in the press shop for former President Bill Clinton, has close ties to White House counselor John Podesta, who is expected to leave his role within weeks to take a leadership position in Clinton's presidential campaign. She's well liked by the media and is a veteran of Democratic politics, having worked for John Edwards' presidential campaign and the press secretary of the Democratic National Committee.
A White House official acknowledged the dual departures were "significant," but said there was "value in bringing in new, energized staff with fresh ideas and new perspectives."

The official cast the departures as an opportunity for President Obama and his chief of staff, Denis McDonough, to build a new communications infrastructure "specifically designed to work on the president's goals for the next 18 months in a rapidly-changing media environment."

"Instead of filling jobs as one-offs, this timing presents an opportunity to build a cohesive team that is expressly designed to achieve and implement the president's priorities for the fourth quarter of his presidency," the official said.

Still, the departures seem to underscore the extent to which focus, even inside the West Wing, is shifting to Hillary Clinton's fledgling campaign.

There has been significant speculation about the timing of an announcement, and who will help run the campaign of the former Secretary of State. In addition to Podesta and Palmieri, Obama campaign pollster Joel Benenson and campaign media adviser Jim Margolis are expected to be involved in the leadership structure of her campaign.

Republican National Committee spokesman Michael Short used the moves to cast Clinton as a continuation of the Obama presidency.

"It's getting clearer with each Obama official leaving for Hillary Clinton's campaign that the sole purpose of her candidacy is to continue his failed policies under another name," Short said. "Voters overwhelmingly don't want a third term for President Obama's liberal agenda, but that's what Hillary Clinton intends to give them."

Two trusted aides depart Obama's circle (WAPO)
By Juliet Eilperin and David Nakamura
February 5, 2015
The Washington Post

President Obama is losing two of his most trusted aides in a White House exodus that will shrink the already small circle of confidants around the president.

Both White House senior adviser Dan Pfeiffer - one of President Obama's longest-serving aides and top political strategists - and communications director Jennifer Palmieri are leaving the administration in the coming weeks.

The exits come at the same time as a handful of other top staffers are also on their way out this month, including Obama's senior counselor John D. Podesta and his Ebola strategy coordinator, Ron Klain. Podesta and Palmieri are joining the nascent 2016 presidential campaign of Hillary Rodham Clinton.

The flurry of departures presents a challenge for the president, who has a limited window for action before the political center of gravity shifts toward the 2016 presidential campaign. The Pfeiffer departure means that nearly every member of the team who helped orchestrate Obama's rise to prominence has left the White House.

Palmieri is one of the president's top female advisers and has played a key role in the administration's media relations efforts, first as Pfeiffer's deputy and then his successor in the top communications job.

"It's going to be a really strange world without Dan Pfeiffer in the White House," said Jim Messina, who served as Obama's deputy chief of staff during his first term and managed the president's reelection bid. "It now kind of leaves Valerie [Jarrett] and the president as the last two along for the whole journey."

A White House official, who asked not to be identified in order to discuss personnel matters, said Obama and his chief of staff, Denis McDonough, were discussing how to restructure Pfeiffer's role and bring on new staff to implement the president's agenda for the next two years.

"We need energized, new people to do that," the aide said.

The 39-year-old Pfeiffer, who described his own role in a Post interview as trying to shape how the president and the rest of the nation see "Barack Obama 10 years from now," has worked doggedly to amplify the president's message and leave a mark on the Democratic Party more broadly. A workaholic and sports fanatic, he has aggressively experimented with social media and other digital tools to bypass traditional news organizations and communicate directly with the public.

He first joined Obama as a staff member in his Senate office and, over the years, developed a bond with the president that became a friendship based on common interests, especially their love of basketball, said Tommy Vietor, a former National Security Council spokesman.

"Dan has been beside me on every step of this incredible journey, starting with those earliest days of the campaign in 2007," Obama said in a statement. "And through it all, he's been smart, steady, tireless and true to the values we started with. Like everyone else in the White House, I've benefited from his political savvy and his advocacy for working people. He's a good man and a good friend, and I'm going to miss having him just down the hall from me."

During Obama's first term, Pfeiffer spent much of it as communications director, a behind-the-scenes job that focused more on developing and disseminating the administration's message about political and policy initiatives. He had a hand in virtually everything the White House did as he sought to coordinate the message between the West Wing and the vast government bureaucracy, colleagues said.

Pfeiffer developed a reputation for being driven and demanding, often sending co-workers e-mails about news stories at all hours of the night. After suffering a mini-stroke two years ago, he returned to work the next day. He changed his diet and made an effort to strike a better balance in his life.

He was often antagonistic with reporters over their coverage, sending them angry e-mails. Inside the West Wing, Pfeiffer was often the one reminding others that amid the day-to-day scandals that dominate Washington discourse, they should not forget the reasons Obama ran for office.

"He would step back and ask what do the American people care about - jobs, the economy, the big-picture things that you have to be focusing on," Vietor said.

But the intensely competitive Pfeiffer was often deeply engaged in those arguments. In 2012, he apologized to columnist Charles Krauthammer after accusing him, in a blog post on the White House Web site, of making a "ridiculous claim" that Obama had returned a bust of Winston Churchill to the British Embassy that had been displayed in the Oval Office.

"This is 100% false. The bust [is] still in the White House. In the Residence. Outside the Treaty Room," Pfeiffer wrote. In fact, Krauthammer was right and Pfeiffer had mistakenly referred to another Churchill bust that had been given to Lyndon B. Johnson.

Palmieri, who served in the Clinton White House and joined the Obama administration in December 2011, played a key role in improving the president's visibility, and she has a reputation for being able to foster and maintain good relations with members of the national media.

"In our strategic discussions, Jen has been a consistent advocate of the president taking a leading, visible role in engaging the public and driving our message," White House press secretary Josh Earnest said by e-mail.

Clinton is revamping her communications and press strategy - a minefield for a candidate with a deep distrust of the news media.

A senior Democratic strategist supporting Clinton, who requested anonymity because Clinton has not yet said she is running, said Palmieri emerged last month as the leading candidate to head the former secretary of state's campaign communications operation. For an image-conscious campaign where men have been identified for nearly all the top positions, according to the strategist, the team wanted a widely respected woman as communications director.

Obama has been criticized by other Democrats and even agency officials inside the administration of at times being too insular, while relying on his small bevy of longtime advisers. One former aide to President George W. Bush cautioned Wednesday that Pfeiffer's departure, along with Podesta and Klain, could leave the remaining few long-timers with even more power.

Rep. Steve Israel (N.Y.), an influential Democrat with close ties to the White House, said it was not surprising that some of Obama's staff would want to leave now, when "it's on a high note."

The president will continue to be guided by the aides who helped win the White House, even if they are no longer on the payroll. On Jan. 10, a group of Obama's former aides gathered in the White House to discuss both the upcoming State of the Union address and how to manage the remainder of the president's term.

Pfeiffer's alma mater's basketball team, the Georgetown Hoyas, was playing during the session, according to a participant, prompting Pfeiffer to check his smartphone regularly as the advisers conferred with the president.

At one moment Pfeiffer's head jerked up, and he quietly uttered a curse word. "Hoyas down by two," he whispered to a couple of colleagues, by explanation. Georgetown ended up losing.

Some predict more basketball in Pfeiffer's future. His White House departure "guarantees he will spend the NCAA tournament ensconced in fritos and Yuengling surrounded by 15 TV sets," CNN's Jake Tapper wrote on Twitter.

Hillary Clinton signals desire for fresh start with press (MSNBC)
By Alex Seitz-Wald
February 4, 2015
MSNBC

White House Communications Director Jennifer Palmieri plans to leave the administration in the coming months, likely to take a top job on Hillary Clinton's emerging presidential campaign-in-waiting.

The White House confirmed Palmieri's departure to msnbc, which was first reported by the Wall Street Journal Wednesday evening. Palmieri is expected to join a Clinton campaign led by fellow White House official John Podesta, who is close with Palmieri and will step down soon as well.

The move is perhaps the strongest evidence yet that Clinton is moving ahead with a 2016 candidacy, and signals that she intends to seek warmer relations with the press than during her last presidential bid.

"There's been a collective sigh of relief from flacks and reporters alike," said one Democratic communications operative, who requested anonymity to speak candidly. "It is clear they're ready to turn the page."

The sentiment was reflected by several Democratic press operatives who spoke with msnbc Wednesday night, many of whom had worried about a repeat of Clinton's hostile posture towards the press from 2008.

Mike McCurry, who served as Bill Clinton's White House Press Secretary, called the hire a "smart move," while other operatives praised Palmieri as smart and lacking in ego.

"Her campaign can't double down on a decade-old failed strategy with the press. That approach just made the coverage worse and made life miserable for everyone. Today's news seems like a first step in the right direction," said another Democratic communications operative.

Last year, Politico surveyed 61 White House reporters and asked them to name the most helpful official in the building. Their clear top choice was Palmieri.
McClatchy White House Reporter Steve Thomma, who until recently served as president of the White House Correspondent's Association, said Clinton is respected by White House reporters. "I've known Jen since the Clinton White House," he said in an email. "She won't always tell us what we want to know. But she's accessible, and likes talking with reporters."

Clinton's 2008 campaign was beset by many problems, but one of it's major woes was perpetually difficult relations with the press. Her communications director, Phil Singer, was infamous for berating journalists and staffers alike in an especially harsh manner, even for the sharp-elbowed world presidential campaigns.

Clinton offered little access to reporters traveling with her during her first run, at least while she was a top the polls, and her team had what former aides and staffers alike described as an almost paranoid and hostile view of the Fourth Estate.

As Clinton has prepared for a run over the past year, Democrats hoping she would change her posture have been watching warily from the sidelines as some unflattering stories emerged. "The campaign has a choice of how they're going to treat the press. And that matters not just philosophically, but actually," said one concerned Democratic ally last month.

Advisors to Clinton insist a 2016 campaign will be different from 2008, and she so far delivered with hires from outside her orbit of longtime loyalists Palmieri worked for former North Carolina Sen. John Edwards's presidential campaign that year, not Clinton, before joining Podesta at the Center for American Progress after the election.

But operatives also say that Clinton herself will set the tone for her campaigns interactions with the press. Clinton has been wary of the press in the past, but reportedly got along well the press corps that covered her as secretary of state. In one sign of goodwill, Clinton recently agreed to present an award next month for journalism, named in honor of the late New York Times reporter Robin Toner.

Whether the moves ultimately signal meaningful change remain to be seen.

The Democratic establishment is uniting behind Hillary Clinton (Vox)
By Ezra Klein
February 5, 2015
Vox

1. The Wall Street Journal reports that Jen Palmieri, the current White House communications director, will leave her post in the spring to become communications director on Hillary Clinton's nascent presidential campaign.

2. This comes after reports that top White House advisor Jon Podesta will leave his post to chair Clinton's campaign.

3. There's a message in these moves: the Democratic establishment is uniting behind Clinton, and doing so early.

4. At this point, we know much more about who Clinton's top political staffers will be than who her top policy staffers will be.

It's Clinton, not Biden, who's absorbing the Obama White House's top operatives

In addition to Palmieri and Podesta, Joel Benenson, Obama's top pollster, is expected to be part of the Clinton campaign as well. You expect to see this kind of top White House talent making early moves towards a campaign when it's the vice president gearing up for a run. But it's Clinton, not Biden, who looks to be absorbing the many of the key players in Obamaworld.

This speaks to Clinton's weird and enviable position: she's running with the traditional advantages of the vice president — staffing talent, name recognition, national donor network, etc — but she isn't as closely tied to Obama's record as Biden would be. She can run as Obama's anointed successor while retaining the space to criticize.

The Democratic Party is united
The 2008 Democratic primary was rough (remember the PUMAs?), in part because it came in a period when Democratic Party really had been deeply divided on key questions of foreign policy. But the 2016 Democratic Party is unusually unified.

As Matt Yglesias wrote back in June, Clinton's overwhelming frontrunner status is a function of that unity. There's no obvious challenger for dissatisfied Democrats to flock to because there's no obvious issue that can power an insurgent campaign the way Iraq powered Obama's 2008 campaign.

Clinton's political team is coming into focus. Her policy team is still a mystery.

In addition to Palmieri and Podesta, the New York Times names a number of other political strategists who appear likely to assume key roles in Clinton's campaign:

Brian Fallon, currently at the Justice Department, is expected to potentially handle rapid response, and Karen Finney, a longtime Democratic operative and MSNBC regular, could serve as a press secretary.

Tapping Ms. Palmieri rounds out a team of senior advisers who could lead Clinton's campaign, including Joel Benenson and Jim Margolis who both worked on President Obama's presidential campaigns. Robby Mook, who managed Terry McAuliffe's successful campaign for governor of Virginia, is expected to be campaign manager.

That's a murderer's row of communication staffers, pollsters, and campaign strategists. But it's not clear yet who will serve as Clinton's top policy staffers. Which is part of why it's hard to say much about what Clinton's agenda will look like. There look to be hints if you stare for very long at the policy proposals being released by longtime policy allies of the Clinton's, but her campaign is staffing up its political side well in advance of its policy side.

2016 election campaign will debate U.S. troops to stop Islamic State (McClatchy)
By David Lightman
February 4, 2015
McClatchy Washington Bureau

The horrifying murder of a Jordanian pilot, made public this week, suggests that U.S. efforts to stop the Islamic State extremist group are ineffective, making it more likely that the 2016 election campaign will become a debate about ground troops.

President Barack Obama has launched waves of airstrikes at Islamic State targets in Iraq and Syria, but he steadfastly rules out sending ground troops into combat.

At least six potential Republican presidential candidates won't dismiss that option. Others, though, hedge when asked how they'd proceed beyond criticizing Obama's airstrikes-only strategy as ineffective.

Dealing with the Islamic State is risky political business. Politicians have to be careful that they don't appear to be taking advantage of fear and outrage over the group's brutality. And they know that ground troops are not a crowd-pleasing idea, since a war-weary public has vivid memories of the lengthy U.S. involvement in Iraq and Afghanistan.

Americans are increasingly worried about terrorist threats and want heightened readiness and a tough response. A recent Pew Research Center survey found combating terrorism inching ahead of the economy as Americans' top priority for Obama and Congress. Two-thirds were concerned that the Islamic State was a major threat to this country.

The drumbeat of horrors keeps the apprehension fresh. The beheadings of hostages , the killings at the offices of satirical Paris-based magazine Charlie Hebdo and the burning alive of Jordanian Lt. Moaz al Kasasbeh intensify the concern.

Republicans, far more than Democrats, have for months sensed an opportunity to use terrorism policies to their advantage, and aren't relenting.

"There is a Democrat in the White House, so it's a little easier (for Republicans) to be hawkish," said Craig Robinson, editor of TheIowaRepublican.com , a partisan website.

Add to that the prospect of former Secretary of State Hillary Clinton as the Democratic nominee, even though she was in office in 2011, when American forces killed terrorist mastermind Osama bin Laden. As a U.S. senator, Clinton voted in 2002 to authorize President George W. Bush to use military force in Iraq, a vote she later said she regretted.

"Republicans likely view her as being weak on foreign policy," said Robinson.

Clinton said last month that military action against Islamic terrorists was "critical." She did not get more specific about U.S. ground troops.

Republicans argue that weakness from the Obama administration, including the withdrawal of combat troops from Iraq, allowed the rise of the Islamic State. "We should not be surprised," former Virginia Gov. James Gilmore said of Tuesday's murder. "When the good guys step out and leave a void, the bad guys step in and fill it."

Ground troops, many suggest, could or should be an option. Among their views:

– Former Texas Gov. Rick Perry. He "believes we shouldn't take options off the table when it comes to protecting America's interests," said spokeswoman Lucy Nashed.

– Retired neurosurgeon Ben Carson. "If you need ground troops to take 'em out, you put in ground troops," he told McClatchy in a recent interview .

– Wisconsin Gov. Scott Walker. "We have to be prepared to put boots on the ground if that's what it takes," he told ABC on Sunday.

– Sen. Marco Rubio of Florida. The fight against the Islamic State "might require some element of U.S. ground power in order to finish the job," he told CNN last fall . He continues to think the U.S. shouldn't take options off the table.

– Sen. Lindsey Graham of South Carolina. He suggested "ground troops on the American side to supplement a regional force . . . with large enough numbers to defeat" the Islamic State. He called for about 10,000 American support personnel "to make sure that we win not only in Syria but in Iraq."

– Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky has been a supporter of U.S. airstrikes, though he said Obama had acted improperly by not seeking congressional authorization first. In December, he introduced a resolution providing that consent, which hasn't been taken up for a vote. It included a section limiting how ground forces could be used.

It said such forces could be used "for limited operations against high value targets or as necessary for advisory and intelligence gathering operations." Ground power could also be used to protect or rescue U.S. citizens or military personnel from "imminent danger" posed by the Islamic State.

Others are less specific.

Sen. Ted Cruz of Texas suggested Tuesday, "The question of what is to be required should be a military question driven by the objective."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The problem with Obama's foreign policy, he said, is that "the objective has not been focused appropriately on destroying ISIS. Rather, it has been a photo op foreign policy."

Former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush told a New York audience last fall that the rise of the Islamic State has come partly because of allies' inability to trust Obama and his policies. His office didn't respond to requests for comment. Nor did former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee's political committee.

Former United Nations Ambassador John Bolton wanted to see a more focused strategy.

"The United States needs an objective more than anything else," he said. "Asking about U.S. ground forces before asking about what our objective should be is a propaganda technique encouraged by the White House, and which reveals all the weaknesses of current administration thinking."

Asking anyone to predict the specifics of policy two years ahead is probably an impossible task, though.

"I can't tell you today what is the best policy for whatever crisis is to come," said former Gov. Gilmore, who headed an influential high-level congressional panel before and after the Sept. 11, 2001, terrorist attacks that assessed threats and recommended policies.

What is clear is this, said Carroll Doherty, Pew director of political research: "There's always potential for national security and terrorism to be an issue."

Justice Hillary? What could have been (MSNBC)
By Alex Seitz-Wald
February 4, 2015
MSNBC

In his new book, longtime advisor David Axelrod reveals that President Barack Obama briefly considered appointing Hillary Clinton to the Supreme Court after she withdrew from the 2008 presidential race.

Obama ended up naming her secretary of state instead, but some Clinton allies have long been warm to the idea of the Yale-educated lawyer being named to the high court.

In an October 2008 interview with Fox News, Clinton flatly ruled out any interest in the job. She said there was "zero" chance she would be named to the court. "I have no interest in doing that," she added.

But in the same interview, she also came close to slamming the door shut on running for president again. The chance of another White House bid was "probably close to zero," she said.

When Justice John Paul Stevens stepped down in 2011, speculation grew that the then-secretary of state might be on Obama's short list to replace Stevens. Even GOP Sen. Orrin Hatch, a former chairman of the Judiciary Committee, was open to the idea.

But the White House quashed the notion, "The President thinks Secretary Clinton is doing an excellent job as secretary of state and wants her to remain in that position," said White House spokesman Tommy Vietor, who, incidentally, would go on to help Clinton in 2014 around the rollout of her memoir.

And the chatter grew again in the lead-up to the 2012 presidential election. As Clinton prepared to step down as secretary of state, some Democrats floated the idea of Clinton and Vice President Joe Biden switching jobs. Others suggested she replace Justice Ruth Bader Ginsburg, whom some Democrats wanted to resign from the bench ahead of the election to ensure Obama would choose her replacement, in case a Republican won that year.

Last year, former Clinton White House Press Secretary Mike McCurry provocatively suggested the idea again, writing in op-ed for Real Clear Politics that "Hillary is probably the one person Barack Obama could nominate who would be confirmed in a nanosecond."

Of course, an appointment on the high court would have made it very difficult – if not impossible – for Clinton to run for president in 2016.

Already, some Democrats have privately speculated, if somewhat factiously, that a President Clinton could appoint Obama, a constitutional law professor by trade, to the court.

The $500,000 Green Card: Obama, Clinton Kin Courted By Foreign Middlemen (ABC News)
By Matthew Mosk and Brian Ross
February 4, 2015
ABC News

The obscure immigration program that helps wealthy foreigners get American Green Cards is proving profitable to some people with very familiar names.

Hillary Clinton's brother is involved. So are powerful California politician Willie Brown and Chicago political boss Richard M. Daley. One firm that helps wealthy Chinese gain access to the little-known immigration program even tried to recruit President Obama's half-brother, Mark Obama-Ndesandjo.

"There are always going to be people in China -- and in any country for that matter -- who will try to use influence and try to use well-known people for business opportunities," Obama told ABC News.

The immigration program in question is known by its visa designation -– EB5. It provides a short-cut to a Green Card for foreign nationals willing to invest $500,000 to $1 million in certain American business and development ventures. Obama said he was approached by a Chinese firm trying to find Chinese investors for a transit development in the Los Angeles suburb of El Monte.

"They said they wanted to pay a lot," said Obama, who shared the same father as the American President, but now lives in China. "But I told them I'm out of this, I don't want anything to do with it."

His gut instinct against further involvement appears to have been well placed. The El Monte development as first proposed was never built and the original developers are no longer involved. And like more than three dozen others connected to the immigration program, it became the subject of a wide-ranging federal investigation, according to documents obtained by ABC News.

Politicians have been an attractive draw for the so-called EB-5 regional centers. The privately-run centers have the job of recruiting foreign investors –- most of them coming from China. The centers then pair the investors (and their money) with various hotel developments, business ventures and construction projects.

Familiar names such as Obama or Clinton -- as in Hillary Clinton's brother Anthony Rodham, who runs a regional center called Gulf Coast Funds Management -- help lend prestige to the ventures, Obama-Ndesandjo said. That's even true despite having a distant relationship with his half-brother – a topic Obama discussed in his recent book, An Obama's Journey.

"My feeling is that they probably felt that they would be able to get some status from that," he said.

Rodham did not return calls from ABC News seeking comment for this report.

The list of political names with ties to EB-5 continues to grow. Just this week, The Chicago Sun Times reported on Daley's involvement in Tur Partners, a firm the former Chicago mayor opened with his son, and has been approved by Homeland Security to recruit overseas investment for those looking to obtain permanent U.S. residency.

In a number of high profile cases, internal documents show that regional centers with political connections made efforts to use them. When Terry McAuliffe, now the governor of Virginia, got involved in an electric car venture that was funded in part with EB-5 investments, he attempted to unclog the government review process with calls and emails to the head of the program, Alijandro Mayorkas, internal emails show. Sen. Harry Reid also used his political muscle to persuade the immigration agency to expedite the processing of visas for investors in a Las Vegas hotel and casino project.

Sen. Charles Grassley said he has spoken to several whistleblowers who are concerned about the impact of this kind of political pressure.

"I have run across concerns from whistle blowers that people within the Department of Homeland Security administering this program have... responded to political pressure to do what I call get to yes very quickly," Grassley told ABC News.

The investment program exploded in popularity during the recent economic downturn, in large part because it encouraged investment at a time many development projects were struggling to find financing. Peter Joseph, who heads the trade association for EB-5 regional centers, said there is nothing unusual about politicians getting involved to help cut through red tape in Washington.

"Generally speaking, it's very common for congressional offices to undertake issues on behalf of constituents that -- involve dealing with federal bureaucracy," Joseph said.

Politicians appreciated that, Joseph said, because in many cases the foreign investment stimulated job creation in their districts. Las Vegas, where construction had stagnated as the recession hit, was a prime example of that.

"Senator Reid is proud to have successfully fought for a project that creates 8,600 Nevada jobs," a Reid spokesman told ABC News in response to questions.

Increasingly, EB-5 programs have created headaches for the politicians who got involved. In South Dakota, the use of political influence in an EB-5 venture to expand dairy operations in the state became grist for attack ads in the recent U.S. Senate campaign. McAuliffe's reported efforts to enlist help for his project from Mayorkas (a one-time Clinton appointee) wound up grist for political attacks during his 2013 gubernatorial campaign. McAuliffe released a statement at the time saying he made no effort to prod the immigration agency into granting visas. In his statement, he blamed Grassley for ginning up the controversy.

"I find it unfortunate that a Republican Senator from Iowa -- who has a long history of support for the EB-5 program —- selectively released information for the purpose of partisan attacks instead of getting facts," McAuliffe said in the statement.

The GOP's 2016 Edge (Politico)
By Larry Sabato , Kyle Kondik and Geoffrey Skelley
February 4, 2015
Politico

The 2016 presidential election is going to resemble Thomas Hobbes' famous description of the natural state of human life in two ways: It will be nasty and brutish

What it will not be is short.

The campaign shifted into full swing on December 16, when former Florida governor Jeb Bush announced that he would "actively explore the possibility of running for president," and it accelerated with Mitt Romney's double January bombshell that he was considering, then had stopped considering, a third run.

Beyond Bush, a growing list of credible and incredible Republicans have been gearing up to run, while the Democratic heavyweight, Hillary Clinton, has been agonizing not over if, but when, she will announce her campaign.

Let's put the primaries aside, though, and assume (maybe dangerously) that both parties, as they typically do, produce credible nominees from each party's mainstream to compete for the presidency.

At this early stage, does either party have an obvious edge?

Around the time of the GOP-dominated midterms, it seemed logical to say the Republicans held the advantage. Not because their strong performance in congressional and gubernatorial races has any predictive value—ask President Romney about how well 2010's midterms predicted the future—but because President Barack Obama's approval rating was mired in the low 40s. Should Obama's approval be low, he'll be a drag on any Democratic nominee, who will effectively be running for his third term.

Alan Abramowitz of Emory University, writing for our Crystal Ball newsletter, recently assessed the importance of Obama's approval to the next election. Basically, if Obama's over 50 percent, the Democratic nominee gets an edge; if he's under, the Republican does. The election won't be quite this simple, of course, but you can't beat presidential job approval as a leading predictive indicator—though it is a bit less powerful when the incumbent isn't running.

Obama is not at 50 percent approval in most polls, but his numbers have been better lately as the country's economic outlook has improved. In addition to sunnier GDP and unemployment statistics, consumer confidence is at its highest point in a decade, according to a University of Michigan survey.

This upward trend could change, of course, with a new recession, a Middle Eastern crisis or a fresh political scandal. We just don't know what Obama's approval rating will be when 2016 rolls around, but his standing matters a great deal even though he isn't on the ballot.

On the other side of the party ledger, it's very possible the Republicans will split deeply or choose an ideologically narrow, unelectable nominee. It appears that the GOP will have one of the largest, and probably the largest, field of candidates in modern presidential history (while Democrats have one of the smallest). Intense competition can invigorate a party, but the dangers of corrosive factionalism are substantial—and the current Republican Party is faction-ridden.

All that said, some might put a pinkie on the scale for the GOP at this very early moment. Why? Primarily because American politics is cyclical, and our recurrent history makes an argument for turnover at 1600 Pennsylvania Ave.

Running for a third consecutive presidential party term probably does exact a penalty on the incumbent's party. Dan McLaughlin, writing at the conservative website The Federalist, looked at the 11 elections conducted since the end of the Civil War when there was no incumbent on the ballot and an incumbent had been reelected in the previous election (which is what we'll have in 2016). He found that the incumbent party lost an average of 6.9 percent of the two-party vote in the next election. So, subtract 6.9 percent from Obama's 2012 share of 52 percent, and the Republican wins the presidency quite easily—though in today's polarized America such a significant shift from one election to the next doesn't seem very likely.

Still, if in every state there were a more modest uniform shift of 3 points in the 2012 result from the Democratic ticket to the Republican ticket, Republicans would win 305 electoral votes—35 votes more than the 270 needed to lock up the election. Precisely uniform shifts among a diverse 50 states don't happen, but 270 electoral votes certainly isn't an impossible dream for the GOP, despite demographic changes — including the growth of the Hispanic electorate — that favor Democrats. Does the Electoral College really feature a "Big Blue Wall"? Not necessarily.

There's also this: A party winning three presidential victories in a row is uncommon. George H.W. Bush won what was effectively Ronald Reagan's third term in 1988. Before that, the Democrats were the last to win the White House in at least three consecutive elections, from 1932 through 1948 (four elections for Franklin Roosevelt, and one for Harry Truman).

Granted, this history is not conclusive. In recent postwar elections, several candidates have come achingly close to winning a third term for their parties.

A decade and a half ago, Al Gore won the popular vote but narrowly lost the Electoral College to George W. Bush in 2000. Flipping a few hundred votes in Florida would have given him a victory; he also would have won if fewer than 4,000 voters in New Hampshire had voted for him instead of Bush, or if he would have gotten just a little more than a third of the votes that Ralph Nader won.

Less remembered is Gerald Ford's near victory over Jimmy Carter in 1976. Ford lost the two-party vote to Carter by just a little more than 2 points in a late-breaking contest. Flipping fewer than 6,000 votes in Ohio and 4,000 votes in Hawaii would have put Ford at exactly 270 electoral votes. (A faithless Ford elector in Washington State would also have had to refrain from casting his electoral vote for Ronald Reagan—but if his vote had been determinative, he probably wouldn't have gone rogue.)

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Hubert Humphrey in 1968 and Richard Nixon in 1960 each lost the national popular vote by less than a point as they sought third terms for their party.

Prior to that, Truman won a fifth consecutive party term for the Democrats in 1948, Roosevelt won a third Democratic term in 1940, and Herbert Hoover won a third Republican term in 1928.

The point is this: With a few breaks for the White House incumbent party here and there, three straight terms in the White House for one party or the other might seem common as opposed to rare.

What can we say about the 2016 election, then? Mainly, it is likely to be relatively close, especially in the popular vote.

As Sean Trende of RealClearPolitics recently reminded, political science forecasting models based on election "fundamentals"—factors such as the economy and the sitting president's approval rating—suggest the election should be highly competitive. James Campbell, professor of political science at the University at Buffalo-SUNY and someone who studies this subject, agrees. "One lesson from many of the models is that as an open-seat race, the 2016 election is likely to be quite close, has no significant advantage for either the 'in' or 'out' party, and is less of a retrospectively determined contest than one directly involving an incumbent president," Campbell told us. "Presidential approval and the economy will matter, but not nearly as much as it would if President Obama were in the race."

Recent history and the country's current state of starkly polarized politics also presage a competitive contest.

Going back to 1988, there have been seven straight presidential elections that saw neither party win more than 55 percent of the two-party vote. Republican George H.W. Bush garnered 53.9 percent of the two-party vote in his 1988 win but lost his 1992 reelection bid to Democrat Bill Clinton, who won 53.5 percent (with the caveat that third-party candidate Ross Perot won 19 percent of the full vote in that contest). Clinton then won 54.7 percent of the two-party vote in his 1996 reelection. But Clinton's vice president, Al Gore, famously lost in the Electoral College to Republican George W. Bush despite winning the major-party vote 50.3 percent to 49.7 percent. The younger Bush then won reelection in 2004 with 51.2 percent of the two-party vote. In the last two cycles, 2008 and 2012, Democrat Barack Obama won 53.7 percent and 52.0 percent, respectively, of the major-party vote. These seven presidential elections saw an average two-party vote margin of 5.5 percentage points and a median of 6.9 points.

Such a streak of two-party competitiveness has been seen only once before in American electoral history, from 1876 to 1900. In fact, the seven elections in that period were even more competitive than our most recent septet, with an average margin of 2.7 points and a median of 3.0. Twice, in 1876 and 1888, the popular-vote winner lost in the Electoral College, misfires that wouldn't happen again until 2000. The 1880 election saw the closest popular-vote margin in American presidential history, with Republican James Garfield defeating Democrat Winfield Hancock by 0.1 percentage points in the two-party vote—a margin of just over 9,000 votes. The last two elections of that period saw Republican William McKinley twice beat Democrat William Jennings Bryan, with McKinley's 1900 reelection featuring the largest margin in this period, 6.3 percentage points.

These presidential data illustrate in some ways how our current era and the post-Reconstruction years are the two most polarized periods in U.S. political history. Congressional polarization data from voteview.org confirm this view: The last time there was nearly as much ideological distance between Democrats and Republicans in Congress was right around the turn of the 20th century, a peak that wouldn't be seen again until around the turn of the new millennium, and it has since been surpassed. With so much polarization, it's hard to fathom either side pulling off a "landslide" presidential victory without some kind of monumental development. Even the 2008 economic crisis, which almost guaranteed a Democratic victory that November because the collapse occurred on a Republican's watch, didn't lead to a crushing win for Obama, who prevailed by 7 points.

This polarization shows up down the ballot, too. In 1900, for instance, just 3.4 percent of House districts voted for different parties for House and for president (a lack of crossover voting was common in this era). That's fairly similar to 2012, when only 6 percent of House districts backed a different party for House and president.

If this sounds like war between two increasingly distinct partisan tribes, that's because it is.

You might think that the long, fierce battle the country will endure all the way to November 2016 would dull the voters' senses, but it is far more probable that a brutal presidential campaign will sharpen party divisions, engage the public (maybe by angering it) and produce a solid turnout in the end.

Jeb Bush's test: Can a general-election message carry the GOP primaries? (WAPO)
By Dan Balz
February 5, 2015
The Washington Post

Jeb Bush went before the Detroit Economic Club on Wednesday sounding very much like a politician ready and eager to run a general election campaign for president. Whether he is as ready to run for and win the Republican nomination is another question.

For the past two months, Bush has set the pace among prospective Republican presidential candidates. Wednesday's appearance was the latest example. In broad terms, Bush offered Republicans a template for the policy debate about middle-class economics and economic mobility, one designed to put Republicans on a more-level playing field in a debate that Democrats long have believed favors them.

Bush's goal seemed clear: to prod more Americans to look at his party as one that is as committed to address the struggles of middle-class families - but with different solutions than the Democrats. This was neither the "kinder, gentler" rhetoric of his father nor the "compassionate conservative" mantra of his brother. Rather it was a conservative's assertion that liberal policies have failed the very people they claim to help and that the Republican Party should and can offer more effective alternatives.

Echoing President Obama in his State of the Union address, Bush argued that the struggles of the middle class and the "spider web" of policies and circumstances that traps people in poverty are the overriding domestic issues of this cycle. But in contrast to the president, he argued that the federal government is not the place to look for solutions.

Speaking in a city whose recent bout with bankruptcy came to symbolize the decline and neglect of American cities, Bush said his party should take this argument over poverty and the middle class directly into the urban areas, "where our ideas can matter most, where the failures of liberal government are most obvious." In doing so he was seeking to rebut the idea that Republicans are a party of the suburbs, exurbs, small towns and rural America.

But it was as much Bush's demeanor and comfort before his audience as his message that conveyed the kind of campaign he hopes to run (and on the question of whether he will become a candidate, there was little pretense about where he is heading). Though he read from a prepared text, the message he delivered sounded authentically his. Taking questions, he seemed at ease and generally forthcoming - and aware that a candidate for president speaks to a wider audience, no matter the venue where he appears.

Bush's speech Wednesday stopped short of policy proposals. He said he would detail his ideas in the coming months "with a mix of smart policies and reforms to tap our resources and capacity to innovate." At that point, everyone will have a better understanding of whether these ideas represent new approaches or rebranded party orthodoxy.

The most successful presidential candidates generally are those who, at the start of their campaigns, know what they hope to be saying at the end of their campaigns. That is the impression Bush gave on Wednesday. The most successful also are often candidates who redefine their party rather than be defined by it, whether Bill Clinton in reinterpreting his Democratic Party in 1992 or George W. Bush trying to soften the harsher edges of his party in 2000. Is that what Republican primary voters want in 2016?

Some Republicans believe the party can win the White House by energizing the base more effectively than either John McCain in 2008 or Mitt Romney in 2012. They argue that millions of their voters stayed home - working-class whites or religious and social conservatives - because they lacked enthusiasm for their nominees.

Other Republicans believe that the way to win in 2016, given demographic trends, the state of the electoral map and the experience of 2012 in particular, is to find ways to appeal to a broader audience of voters. That's everything from more voters of color, particularly Hispanics, to women (especially single women) to younger voters to suburban moms. Bush clearly falls into this second camp.

Wednesday's performance offered evidence of why Democrats see Bush as a potentially formidable general election candidate against their presumed nominee, former secretary of state Hillary Rodham Clinton - despite the liabilities that come with his last name.

And yet, for all of this, Bush has anything but an easy path to becoming his party's nominee. When Romney and his team were deliberating about whether he should enter the 2016 competition, one question kept coming back at them: Who among Romney's prospective rivals would have an easier path to the nomination? At least in what they were willing to share with reporters, the answer was no one - and certainly not Bush.

The latest poll of Iowa Republicans, from the Des Moines Register and Bloomberg Politics, showed the reason why. Bush is in the middle of the pack in Iowa, the favorite of just 8 percent of likely caucus participants. More troubling, 46 percent gave him a favorable rating, compared with 43 percent who view him unfavorably.

All this can change over the course of a year, but Bush's standing in Iowa today reminds strategists of Clinton in 2007, when she looked strong nationally but more vulnerable in Iowa. She eventually finished third in the caucuses there, behind Obama and John Edwards, an outcome that totally rearranged the Democratic race. Beyond that, though he is now called the GOP front-runner by dint of his name, big-state experience, network and fundraising capacity, Bush's national standing among Republicans is not nearly as strong as Clinton's was among Democrats eight years ago.

Bush's posture on immigration and on educational standards troubles some conservatives. His answer Wednesday to a question about immigration lacked any of the red-meat rhetoric common among other prospective GOP candidates. How he plans to speak to the kind of conservative forum that was held in Iowa recently will be an indicator of his navigational skills.

Bush was asked Wednesday whether Republicans can avoid a repeat of their chaotic 2012 nomination contest, which the questioner likened to the bar scene in "Star Wars." Bush acknowledged the nominating process is often a little bit like the "Wild West," but said he was hopeful that the party's desire to win in 2016, along with moves by the Republican National Committee to limit debates and tighten the primary-caucus season, will have a tempering effect.

There will be many candidates running. The goal, he said, should not be to tear one another down but rather to explain "why you and why are you doing it." Bush will have to explain that persuasively to his fellow Republicans if he hopes to get to the general election.

Carly Fiorina: The GOP's weapon against Hillary Clinton? (Fortune)
By Patricia Sellers
February 4, 2015
Fortune

Is Carly Fiorina the dark horse candidate in the GOP race for President?

That's what Megyn Kelly proclaimed on Fox News this week, after the former Hewlett-Packard CEO rallied the Republicans at the Freedom Summit in Iowa and earned rave reviews there. "We must win in 2016," Fiorina said in an interview on The Kelly File, sounding very much like a candidate. "I don't think this country can endure four years of Hillary Clinton or Elizabeth Warren."

Fiorina, 60, hasn't yet announced she's running, but as she told Kelly on Monday, "it is something that I'm giving very serious consideration to." We bet she'll run…because whatever the challenge she's faced, Carly possesses more ambition than she first lets on.

Fortune knows Fiorina well. She was on the cover of the very first Fortune Most Powerful Women issue, in 1998, when she had had only one story written about her, in Investor's Business Daily. At the time, she was a 44-year-old hotshot at Lucent Technologies. She had risen from entry-level sales to the very top of Lucent's largest division, Global Services, and she had closely advised then-CEO Rich McGinn on the company's IPO, which was a whopping success. (Ah yes, the gogo days of telecom!)

The daughter of an artist mother and a law professor who prodded her to follow in his footsteps, she rebelled by quitting law school and flying off to Italy to teach—and eventually landed at the entry level of AT&T, where she went on to shine in sales. Fiorina knew how to sell products, ideas, and herself—and more power to her. I'll never forget going to Lucent headquarters in New Jersey in the summer of 1998 to interview Pat Russo, who later became Lucent's CEO, and little-known Fiorina, whose charisma and career story turned out to be captivating.

The next day, I told my bosses that Fiorina was such a comer that she could be No. 1 on our first MPW list. Back then, Mattel was the only Fortune 500 company led by a woman (Jill Barad), so we bumped Fiorina above her and Oprah Winfrey to anoint her the No. 1 Most Powerful Woman in Business.

The world noticed. Ten months later, the HP board recruited Fiorina to be the new CEO of the tech giant—"a Fortune 11 company," as Fiorina liked to remind investors about the power of her perch.

"My strength is my strength, but it also can be a weakness," Fiorina once admitted to me, explaining that her style too often worked against her. Granted, she's suffered the unduly harsh judgement (that narrower band of acceptable behavior) that cripples too many high-flying women leaders. But Fiorina has always struggled to channel her fierce ambition. Passionate in every pursuit and often prickly toward her doubters, she showed her budding political will (and talent for campaigning) when she waged a drag-on proxy fight for HP to buy Compaq. She won. But she lost her more critical leadership campaign when her brashness turned off too many senior managers and her board of directors. The HP board fired her, very publicly, in 2005.

Fiorina moved on advise John McCain in his 2008 Presidential bid, and then she waged a couple battles of her own. She fought off breast cancer in 2009. A year later, she ran against veteran Barbara Boxer to represent California in the U.S. Senate, and she lost.

Now, Fiorina says, she's interested in running for President because the federal government needs fixing. If—or when—she begins her official campaign, there will be no shortage of ways to attack Fiorina—her failed Senate bid, her ouster from HP, her leadership style—but she's worth watching because she's knows how to fight, and she enjoys it.

And for the GOP, she's already proving herself to be a handy weapon against Hillary Clinton. "Like Hillary Clinton, I too have traveled hundreds of thousands of miles around the globe," Fiorina said at the Freedom Summit. "But unlike her, I have actually accomplished something. Mrs. Clinton, flying is an activity not an accomplishment." Ouch! That's hardly fair or realistic, but we can fantasize: Wouldn't Carly vs. Hillary be fun?

My problem with the Clinton Death Star (Yahoo News)
By Matt Bai
February 5, 2015
Yahoo News

A year before the Iowa caucuses, Washington's entrenched Democrats are already girding for a general election. You could raid the Four Seasons at the height of breakfast and not turn up a single Democratic lobbyist, consultant or lawmaker who isn't already behind Hillary Clinton — and who doesn't assume she's the nominee.

Writing in Politico last week, the ever-prescient Mike Allen reported that Clinton has already charged John Podesta, recently a senior Obama adviser and the closest thing the party has to a reigning wise man, with assembling her rumbling tank of a campaign. The current hope is that Clinton may not even have to risk debating in the primaries, unless someone really is crazy enough to run against her. (Um … have you guys actually heard Bernie Sanders?)

I have to say, there's something about this latest iteration of Clinton Industries that I find a little dispiriting, though probably not for the reasons you might think.

It's not that I think Hillary Clinton couldn't be a good president, or even the right fit for the moment. Going back to her days in the Senate, Clinton has always been pragmatic and dexterous with the machinery of government. That might be a welcome contrast with Barack Obama, who after six years in the job still seems to regard himself as a critic of the system, rather than as the guy who owns it.

And although you might be tempted to say I'm just a typical journalist who's dying to cover a more exciting Democratic primary campaign than the one taking shape right now, that really isn't it, either. I've seen all the freezing, late-night rallies and desperate attack ads I need to see for one lifetime. If Hillary can spare us more of that a year from now, I say go for it.

Some people around Clinton assume that any skepticism about her candidacy has to do with latent sexism, but I'm pretty sure that's not my issue, either. Last week, my 6-year-old daughter informed me that she couldn't be president because she's a girl. So believe me, if Hillary Clinton takes the oath of office on the third Friday of 2017, we'll be watching together.

Nor am I necessarily devastated, as some people are, by the idea of yet another Clinton campaign (which would be the fourth in seven presidential elections), or even another Bush-Clinton matchup, should it come to that. Dynastic politics can't be good for the democracy, but that's up to the voters, and if they want to treat the presidency like it's a "Rocky" sequel, so be it.

No, my problem with the Clinton Death Star strategy — and the sense of entitlement that comes with it — is that a generation of influential Democrats seems to have lost touch with the anti-establishment impulse that brought them into politics in the first place.

Although it's hard for us Gen Xers or you millennials to envision, the parties didn't always pick their presidents in these crazy caucuses and primaries. Until 1968, in fact, the process in the Democratic Party was mostly controlled by a loose affiliation of elected officials, machine bosses and union chiefs, each of whom commanded the loyalty of "regulars" who walked the precincts and manned the phones.

There were primaries in some states, but they mainly existed to demonstrate the viability of the candidates, which might in turn persuade the insiders to get behind them.

But then along came the young, liberal reformers of the '60s generation, opponents of Vietnam and segregation, who felt shut out by the backroom process dominated almost exclusively by white men. The modern primary system, with its reliance (for better or worse) on binding votes in the states, sprang from a commission chaired by the antiwar senator George McGovern, who turned around in the very next election and used the new system to shock the establishment and steal the nomination for himself. (Republicans almost immediately followed suit.)

For the next several elections, younger Democratic activists worked to undermine the plans of the aging establishment. A lot of them backed Ted Kennedy in his bid to unseat an incumbent president, Jimmy Carter, in 1980. One of Clinton's most important loyalists and fundraisers, Harold Ickes, helped lead Jesse Jackson's surprisingly strong insurgency against Michael Dukakis and the party establishment in 1988.

By then, though, a lot of the reformers of the '60s and '70s were starting to build a new establishment of their own. Some — Podesta and Ickes among them — started powerful lobbying and public relations shops. Others became admen and pollsters, pioneering the new, lucrative campaign-for-hire industry. Still others, like the Clintons, ran for office themselves.

And now, whether they like to think of it this way or not, a lot of these onetime reformers make up a powerful machine that's just as bent on controlling events as the bosses were back in the day. They're no longer interested in having a fight over the direction of the party, in empowering new voices and letting the voters decide. They're interested in locking up the big money, freezing out potential competitors and making sure other officials get on board early, so as to avoid any intraparty debate.

Witness the procession of Democratic boomers, liberals as unimpeachable as Howard Dean and Al Franken, who have lined up in recent months to endorse a candidate who isn't even running yet and hasn't offered a single reform one could endorse.

I'm not saying it's all the fault of Clinton or her longtime acolytes that there aren't other candidates coming forward to challenge her. The party's ranks of up-and-coming politicians took a real hit during the wave elections of 2010 and 2014, and there just aren't a ton of strong, natural contenders this time around. It's not Clinton's job to invent them.

But there are some potential rivals, including the more than able vice president of the United States and the well-regarded, former two-term governor of Maryland, Martin O'Malley. And at some point, if your goal is to rig this thing for Clinton, you have to look in the mirror and ask yourself if this is the kind of Democratic politics you really intended to create — the kind where the establishment decides who the nominee will be 18 months before the convention, without a single idea on the table or a single choice yet defined.

You have to ask yourself something else, too: Does trying so blatantly to steamroll the modern nominating process make it more likely that your candidate will avoid a bunch of bruising primary debates, or less so? If you got your start in Democratic politics 40-odd years ago, the answer to that one should be obvious.

Income inequality emerges as key issue in 2016 presidential campaign (LAT)
By David Lauter
February 5, 2015
Los Angeles Times

Twenty-two months ahead of the 2016 election, the nascent presidential campaign already has a leading issue: the economy's failure to produce rising incomes for the middle class.

From World War II through the 1970s, virtually all working Americans saw paychecks rise. Those gains have become uneven since the 1980s, however, and in the last 15 years, they stopped for most families.

Americans at the middle of the income ladder now earn less, adjusted for inflation, than they did in 2000. Small gains during the early years of the last decade were wiped away by the deep recession that began in 2007.

Although economic growth has resumed, the stock market has soared into record territory, and the number of Americans filing new claims for unemployment benefits has fallen to its lowest level in nearly 15 years, income has remained stuck except for those at the very top.

Voters have noticed. A Gallup poll released Friday, for example, showed that two-thirds of Americans said they were dissatisfied with the way income and wealth are distributed in the U.S.

The unhappiness was most pronounced among those earning $30,000 to $75,000, roughly the middle third of the U.S. population. Nearly 80% expressed dissatisfaction.

That discontent has begun to shape the agendas of presidential hopefuls in both parties.

The issue has moved Democrats to the left, bolstering arguments for a more aggressive effort to redistribute income away from the wealthiest Americans and to do more to help families who earn far less.

The impact can be seen in the budget that President Obama released Monday and in a recent policy blueprint from a group closely aligned with former Secretary of State Hillary Rodham Clinton. Both advocated increasing taxes on inherited wealth to pay for tax cuts and wage supplements for middle-class and lower-income working families.

Republicans also have begun talking about the issue, as former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush did Wednesday in a speech to the Detroit Economic Club. Among other goals, Republicans hope to underscore the fact that income inequality has worsened on Obama's watch.

Until recently, most Republicans dismissed arguments about inequality as an invitation to what they labeled as "class warfare." Now Bush, as well as Florida's Republican senator, Marco Rubio, and other GOP hopefuls have publicly identified the issue as a key problem facing the country.

"The fact that Republicans are feeling they have to talk about inequality" testifies to the issue's power, said Dartmouth College political scientist Brendan Nyhan.

The language Republicans use, at least to describe the problem, often sounds much like Democratic rhetoric.

Bush's Right to Rise political action committee, for example, declares in its mission statement that millions of Americans feel "the playing field is no longer fair or level," a metaphor also employed by the liberals' hero Sen. Elizabeth Warren of Massachusetts for her PAC. In his speech, Bush said Americans were frustrated seeing "only a small portion of the population riding the economy's up escalator."

Rubio, at a recent breakfast for reporters sponsored by the Christian Science Monitor, said the country had experienced a "recovery at the upper echelons in the economy."

"So much of the recovery over the last couple of years has gone to such a small segment of the population that now middle-class and upward-mobility stagnation has become more apparent," he said. "I think it's good that there's a consensus that's what we need to focus on."

Republicans have criticized Obama's proposals, saying they would just make the problem worse. Rep. Paul D. Ryan (R-Wis.), chairman of the House Ways and Means Committee, for example, accused Obama of preaching "envy economics" in his budget, and Bush said in his speech that liberals had built "a spider web that traps people in perpetual dependence" instead of providing incentives for business growth.

Beyond that criticism, Republicans have had an easier time identifying the problem than proposing solutions. Bush, for example, said he would outline proposals in "coming weeks." Even identifying the problem, however, can help a campaign, at least initially.

"It's a way to demonstrate that 'I care about your needs. I care about the average voter,'" said pollster Margie Omero of the bipartisan firm Purple Strategies, based in Alexandria, Va. "'Does he get me?' is the door" that candidates have to get through before voters will listen to policy prescriptions.

When the argument does get to policies, Republicans face the problem that stagnant wages challenge a cornerstone of their economic creed. The GOP has historically argued that growth benefits all segments of society and that, as a result, government can largely leave economic affairs to the free market.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The results of the last 15 years undermine the idea that a rising tide reliably lifts all boats.

Even as the economy has rebounded from the recession, which technically ended in mid-2009, nearly all the gains have gone to the top.

In the first three years of the recovery, 91% of income gains went to the wealthiest 1% of households, a group with incomes above roughly $400,000, UC Berkeley economics professor Emmanuel Saez has found.

Inequality has reached levels not seen since the 1920s, his data show.

Democrats argue that the trend shows the need for a more active role for government. The U.S. and other major economies have experienced a "toxic combination of too little growth and rising inequality," a panel of Democratic economists and policymakers with close ties to Clinton recently declared.

The group, headed by Lawrence H. Summers, who served as Treasury secretary under President Clinton and as chief White House economic advisor under Obama, issued a report that has been widely seen as an early draft of a Hillary Clinton economic platform, should she decide to run.

The report was published by the Center for American Progress, a Washington think tank that is headed by Neera Tanden, policy director for Clinton's 2008 presidential campaign. It was previously run by John Podesta, the White House counselor, who is expected to head her 2016 effort.

Their report contends that the yawning gap between the wealthy and everyone else contradicts America's belief in social mobility and hurts the economy overall. That's because the wealthy tend to spend proportionally less of their income than middle-class families do, so concentrated wealth leads to lower demand for goods and services.

Globalized competition, changes in technology that have eliminated many low-skill jobs and the declining power of labor unions have all played a big role in producing the problem, it says.

Over the long term, the group says, the surest path to higher incomes is improved education to increase the skills of the U.S. workforce. But that could take years to show an impact. In the meantime, many Americans will continue to struggle to gain financial security, the report says.

To combat that, the report offers a menu of policies that add up to a relatively liberal, populist economic platform that Clinton could espouse. They include steps to strengthen unions, an expansion of wage supplements for low-income workers, a middle-class tax cut and more spending on roads, bridges and other infrastructure projects to generate jobs and improve the economy's productivity.

To pay for those measures, the report advocates increased taxes on inherited wealth as well as closing what the report labels as unjustified tax loopholes for corporations and wealthy individuals.

On the Republican side, most potential candidates have not come up with similarly detailed proposals, although Rubio laid out several ideas in a new book he is promoting.

GOP hopefuls have generally argued that Obama's policies should take the blame for stagnant wages, saying that too much regulation and high taxes have stifled business growth and job creation.

For Republicans, however, a credible plan for expanding middle-class incomes may be a necessity for 2016.

In the last election, polls showed one of Obama's strongest advantages was the voter perception that he, more than Republican nominee Mitt Romney, cared about the problems of average Americans. Changing that impression will be even more important this time around, when Democrats hope to finally be able to brag about solid economic growth and unemployment at or below 5%.

Accomplishing that goal is not impossible but will require the GOP to fight on what voters have traditionally seen as Democratic turf. Republicans, said Omero, "have a lot of ground to make up."

The presidential race Kasich, Clinton even among Ohio voters (Columbus Dispatch)
By Darrel Rowland
February 4, 2015
The Columbus Dispatch

Can only John Kasich stop the Hillary Clinton onslaught in battleground Ohio?

The Ohio governor and former secretary of state are essentially deadlocked among Buckeye State voters in a matchup of prospective 2016 presidential hopefuls, a new Quinnipiac Poll shows.

Clinton, a Democrat, tops other Republicans in the poll by double figures. But she beats Kasich only by 44 percent to 43 percent in the first poll by the Connecticut university of potential White House contenders in traditional presidential swing states.

The poll holds good news for Clinton in the battleground states, where no presidential candidate since 1960 has won without taking at least two of the three. Only Kasich in Ohio and former Florida Gov. Jeb Bush in his home state came within single digits of Clinton. Kasich was not polled in Florida or Pennsylvania.

Ohio traditionally has been kind to Clinton and her husband, former President Bill Clinton. He carried the state both times he ran, and she won a crucial 2008 Democratic primary over Barack Obama.

This year, aside from native son Kasich, she is besting all comers:

* 47 percent to 36 percent over Bush.

* 47 percent to 34 percent over New Jersey Gov. Chris Christie.

* 48 percent to 36 percent over Sen. Rand Paul of Kentucky.

* 49 percent to 34 percent over former Arkansas Gov. Mike Huckabee.

A small majority of Ohioans, 51 percent, have a favorable opinion of Clinton, with 40 percent unfavorable. The negatives outweigh the positives for all the leading GOP contenders save Paul, who is largely unknown even though he is from a neighboring state. He is viewed positively by 27 percent, negatively by 25 percent.

Kasich -- who won re-election by more than 30 points in November -- wins a favorable opinion of 43 percent of Ohioans, compared with 29 percent who view him unfavorably. That 14-point-plus rating is 2 points below the figure from Quinnipiac's last Ohio poll, released in July.

The university's telephone poll of 943 registered voters from Jan. 22 through Sunday has a margin of sampling error of plus or minus 3.2 percentage points.

The random, digital-dialed calls resulted in responses from 32 percent independents, 28 percent Democrats, 26 percent Republicans, and 13 percent other or didn't answer.

Vaccine paranoia gives Jeb Bush a shot in the arm (Globe and Mail)
By Konrad Yakabuski
February 5, 2015
The Globe and Mail

Vaccine paranoia cuts across the American political spectrum. Ground zero for the antivaxxers is liberal Marin County, near San Francisco, where hundreds of wealthy, well-educated parents have succumbed to conspiracy theories about a Big Pharma plot to poison their children.

No one does paranoia better than wing-nut conservatives, however. The Republican fringe sees vaccines not as a corporate plot, but as a government one.

Remember Michele Bachmann?

The former Minnesota Republican congresswoman and early 2012 presidential candidate warned that the HPV vaccine could cause "mental retardation." That pretty much put an end to her presidential run. Her political career flamed out soon after.

The race for the 2016 GOP nomination has barely begun, but the paranoid style in GOP politics may have already claimed its first victim. Kentucky senator, med-school grad and expected presidential candidate Rand Paul told CNBC this week that he was aware of "many tragic cases of walking, talking, normal children who wound up with profound mental disorders after vaccines."

Whatever that is, it is not a mainstream point of view. (An official at the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention told Congress that no such incidents have resulted from the current measles vaccine.) Mr. Paul still has strong support among libertarian Republicans. But his vaccine eruption has just made him even more toxic to a party establishment bent on picking a candidate who can win over mainstream voters.

New Jersey Governor Chris Christie might have been that candidate. But he, too, botched the vaccine debate by trying to appease a Republican base that believes in parental choice above all else. He spent a trip to London meant to show off his foreign-policy chops doing damage control, visibly deflated.

The timing could not have been worse for Mr. Christie. With Mitt Romney now officially not running – the 2012 GOP nominee stood down last week, realizing that one more news story about him putting his dog on the car roof would be too much to bear – GOP establishment types are moving fast to lock in their support, and their dollars.

By and large, they are picking Jeb Bush. The former Florida governor, son and brother of former presidents, has steered clear of the vaccine debate, instead choosing downtrodden Detroit to lay out his vision for "reform conservatism" in a Wednesday speech – all while telling parents they "need to make sure their children are vaccinated." It was the unofficial opening act of a campaign focusing on the "Right to Rise" through policies favouring social mobility, a more uplifting idea than Democratic talk of redistribution.

Will it work? The U.S. economy is on a roll – this will favour the Democratic candidate in 2016, provided that a global currency war doesn't entirely cripple American exports and corporate profits. Everyone and Mitt's dog expects that Democrat to be Hillary Clinton, who tweeted this week: "The science is clear: The earth is round, the sky is blue, and #vaccineswork. Let's protect all our kids.

#GrandmothersKnowBest."

The factors that make Mr. Bush a compelling general election candidate – his support for a path to citizenship for undocumented immigrants, his appeal among Hispanic voters and his endorsement of national education standards – make him a tough sell among big chunks of the Republican base.

Many Republicans also doubt that Jeb could win a Bush-Clinton matchup. The country has already elected two Bushes and most feel that's enough. There's Clinton fatigue, too, but Americans are warm to the idea of a woman president.

The deal-breaker for many could be the Terri Schiavo case, which would be endlessly relitigated in a Bush-Clinton campaign. As Florida governor, Mr. Bush intervened to stay a court decision that favoured the husband of a brain-dead woman seeking to disconnect her feeding tube. His legislation was declared unconstitutional. Mr. Bush, a convert to Catholicism, struck many then as a bully for whom the end justified the means.

Those in the party who remain uneasy with Mr. Bush think the fresh, if unexpressive, face of Wisconsin Governor Scott Walker could catch on with both the base and the establishment. Mr. Walker won a 2012 recall election in purple Wisconsin, a de facto referendum on Republican legislation banning collective bargaining in the public sector. He's a hero to free-market types.

Still, no other likely candidate has the machine, the money or the mainstream cred of Mr. Bush.

He has become the overwhelming favourite for the nomination, with a little help from the antivaxxers.

These Anti-Vaxxers Are Funding 'Ready for Hillary' (Daily Beast)
By Jackie Kucinich
February 4, 2015
Daily Beast

Albert Dwoskin and his wife, Claire, have been heavy hitters in Democratic politics for decades, boasting fundraisers with access to top Democratic leaders—even the Clintons.

Bill Clinton has spoken at their mansion in McLean, Virginia twice.

Albert, a real estate developer, donated more than $10,000 to Ready for Hillary—Clinton's campaign in waiting—in 2013. That's on top of the thousands of dollars both Clintons have received from the pair since the 1990s.

But it's Albert and Claire Dwoskin's other hobby that is under scrutiny now. The Dwoskins fund a multimillion-dollar family foundation that has publicly tied the use of vaccines to a rise in autism, and is dedicated to addressing "gaps in the knowledge about the biological and genetic risk factors for vaccine induced brain and immune dysfunction."

In other words, they're vaccination skeptics. And the foundation is just one in a series of anti-vaxx projects that the wealthy couple bankrolls.

The political class's views on vaccines suddenly leapt to the forefront of the national conversation this week, when presumptive presidential candidates Chris Christie and Rand Paul said, to varying degrees, that vaccination should be a matter of parental choice.

The problem is, when parents opt out of the vaccination regime, the rest of us can get infected. In recent days, more than 100 cases in 14 states have caught the measles—a disease all-but-eradicated years ago.

The Dwoskins, through an assistant, said they were not "anti-vaccine," had vaccinated their children, and were just committed to researching the causes of disorders such as autism and Alzheimer's disease.

"Everyone is looking for an easy way to label things; that's not uncommon," said Kellie Boyle, a communications professional who described herself as an "unpaid assistant" for the Dwoskins. "When things are complex, or when things are political, let's go ahead and chalk a label—that you're black or white and there's not anything in between. I think they've been caught in that."

Boyle added that the Dwoskins were shocked by the sudden attention to their cause.

Neither Ready for Hillary nor Hillary Clinton's office returned a request for comment.

But even if the couple are not dyed-in-the-wool anti-vaxxers, the websites of their various foundations contain information that has been debunked or unsubstantiated. During a time when more and more people are becoming infected with diseases best left on the Oregon Trail, their charitable efforts look less than sane.

For example, the foundation warns against the unforeseen consequences of vaccines and links vaccine ingredients—such as aluminum—to autism.

In a September 23, 2014 post on the foundation website, author "dwoskin" wrote:

"Autism spectrum disorder (ASD) has a prevalence of 1 in 68 children—a 30% increase since 2012 according to the Center for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC). ASD was once a rare disorder but is occurring more frequently than before, as more cases are being diagnosed each year. The reason for this increase may be linked to certain ingredients found in vaccines, specifically aluminum formulated vaccines."
While the post cites the CDC statistics, it ignores the CDC's findings that "there is no relationship between vaccines and autism rates in children. Besides [controversial vaccine ingredient] thimerosal, some people have had concerns about other vaccine ingredients in relation to autism as well. However, no links have been found between any vaccine ingredients and autism."

But to "dwoskin," that is neither here nor there, apparently.

The Dwoskin Family Foundation post goes on:

"Autism and ASD can be defined as a condition characterized by impaired cognitive and social skills along with compromised immune function. The fact that ASD rates have rapidly increased over the last two decades suggests that there are environmental components that lead to its prevalence. The root cause of ASD is still unknown; however, current research is suggesting that the use of vaccines are [sic] playing a role in its development."

The Dwoskins also fund the Children's Medical Safety Research Institute (CMSRI), an entity that allows the couple to also fund research on the issue overseas. It, too, has claims that are, let's say, less than true:

"Certain toxic ingredients in vaccines have not been individually tested for safety such as aluminum adjuvants, polysorbate 80 and Thimerosal," the CMSRI website says.

Except there have been studies, according to the Food and Drug Administration. "This study is important because it provides additional scientific information confirming that the benefits of aluminum-containing vaccines administered during the first year of life outweigh any theoretical concerns about the potential effect of aluminum on infants," the FDA website notes.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Experts, like Dr. Paul Offit, a professor of pediatrics in the division of infectious diseases at the Children's Hospital of Philadelphia, told the Daily Beast that the amount of aluminum in vaccines is "logarithmically less" than the amount of the element that could lead to damage in healthy people.

"Generally vaccines are given to people whose kidney's work," he said. "So biologically the notion that the quantity of aluminum contained in vaccines could in any way mimic the toxicity in clinical situations is fanciful."

"Anti-vaccine people…they put this stuff out all the time," Offit added.

The Dwoskins are not only big Democratic donors (name a prominent Democrat and they probably have received money from the pair).

Albert Dwoskin was an appointee in the Clinton administration—twice—serving as the director of the Securities Investor Protection Corporation.

The pair was mentioned in a 2007 ABC story under the title "influence for sale." The story spotlighted a Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee fundraiser at their "posh Northern Virginia manse" and deemed it "one of the highest-dollar fundraisers since the McCain-Feingold campaign finance limits."

"Tonight at the posh Northern Virginia manse of local real estate magnate Albert Dwoskin," the report said. "The Democratic Congressional Campaign Committee will host one of its most expensive events in recent memory—$28,500 per couple—featuring access to [then Speaker Nancy] Pelosi and 10 powerful House committee chairmen."

The Dwoskins' vaccination skepticism might have gone unnoticed if a measles outbreak—which is thought to have originated from unvaccinated children—hadn't begun to spread across the country.

Democrats in particular have spent the last several days gleefully tweaking Republican presidential contenders for their off-message remarks on the topic, after New Jersey Governor Chris Christie called for a "balance" on vaccinations and Senator Rand Paul indicated there might be something to the argument vaccines can harm children.

Hillary Clinton tweeted on Tuesday night, "The science is clear: The earth is round, the sky is blue, and #vaccineswork. Let's protect all our kids. #GrandmothersKnowBest"

But Clinton's belief in vaccines wasn't always so absolute. According to the American Prospect, Clinton wrote in 2008, "I am committed to make investments to find the causes of autism, including possible environmental causes like vaccines."

In an interview with AutismOne last year, Claire Dwoskin explained that the couple's foundation's research is "focused on aluminum as being something that everyone is exposed to through their childhood vaccines and through other environmental factors such as in food, and in skin care products, and over-the-counter medicines, and even baby formula unfortunately has aluminum."

"It's a neurotoxin, it's an immune system toxin, and that past published researchers, over 900 studies, linking aluminum to all kinds of chronic health conditions," she said. "So we thought that was a very rich target for going after for seeing whether or not aluminum is directly linked to autism, Alzheimer's disease and many other conditions."

Outside of the family foundation, Claire Dwoskin also serves on the board of directors of the National Vaccine Information Center or NVIC, a group that is in favor of "informed consent" for parents considering vaccinating their children. Or, in English, an anti-vaxx group.

Claire Dwoskin also funded an anti-vaccine movie—titled The Greater Good.

It served the opposite purpose of good, according to the New York Times. "Carefully excluding critical information that might challenge its sympathies, "The Greater Good" does a disservice both to the suffering of the few and to the public health needs of the many," the paper wrote.

Through Boyle, the assistant, Claire Dwoskin said this wasn't "a political issue."

"She has no problems with what Hillary said, or what Rand Paul says or what anybody says; they are not a political organization," she said. "They simply fund research and education to try to find the causes of these chronic illnesses."

How Democrats Became the Child-Care Party (New York)
By Jonathan Chait
February 4, 2015
New York Magazine

Presidential speeches and budgets are symbolic measures, especially when the Congress is controlled by an opposing party disinclined to pass anything the president wants. But over the last few weeks, Obama has used the symbolic power of these tools to leave an imprint on American politics, if not on government itself. Obama has cemented a decision by the Democratic Party to make quality universal child care the next major goal of American liberalism.

Obama signaled his intention in the State of the Union address, when he announced, "it's time we stop treating child care as a side issue, or as a women's issue, and treat it like the national economic priority that it is for all of us." His budget, released this week, includes $200 billion over the next decade to support child care and early education. But this is not Obama's idea. He is merely ratifying a consensus that has formed among liberal-policy intellectuals.

The rise of early education brings together two powerful strands of liberal thought. The first can be thought of as a kind of social policy: Our society is still constructed as if most households still consist of a working father and a stay-at-home mother, even though that old model has mostly disappeared. The costs of caring for children too young to attend public school is overwhelming for working-class and even middle-class parents. Because many parents can hardly afford decent child care on their incomes, huge swaths of the system are horrifying and even dangerous nightmares, as Jonathan Cohn documented two years ago. Parents are forced to stash their children in understaffed and frequently unsafe facilities.

Conceived of this way, America's child-care problem is a humanitarian disaster. It requires public subsidy because most parents cannot adequately finance their own child-care needs, just as Social Security came into existence because most Americans could not adequately provide for their own retirement. If society expects parents to work, it ought to make it possible to do so while raising children, which is a thing we want and need to happen. And this moral-justice logic is a strong enough rationale on its own.

Congress passed a universal child-care law in 1971, but President Nixon, tamping down a revolt among conservatives outraged at his peace overtures with communist China, issued a surprising veto. Nixon's rationale captured the culture-war implications that surrounded the issue at the time. "For the Federal Government to plunge headlong financially into supporting child development," he wrote, "would commit the vast moral authority of the National Government to the side of communal approaches to child rearing over against [sic] the family-centered approach." At the time, when women accounted for a mere 38 percent of the workforce, the notion of public endorsement and subsidy for a program that would allow mothers to avoid their socially required duty to care for their own children seemed, to a major segment of America, radical and threatening. In the current day, when women account for nearly half the workforce, condemning child care as a threat to the family has a more antiquated ring. In the place of a distrust of working mothers, though, the Republican Party has developed a dogmatic opposition to new spending programs that would have shocked even Nixon. (Who even tried to pass universal health care, only for his proposal to be killed by Democrats who deemed it too moderate.)

The other main difference between today and 40 years ago is that advocates of universal child care now see it not just as a social issue but an economic strategy.

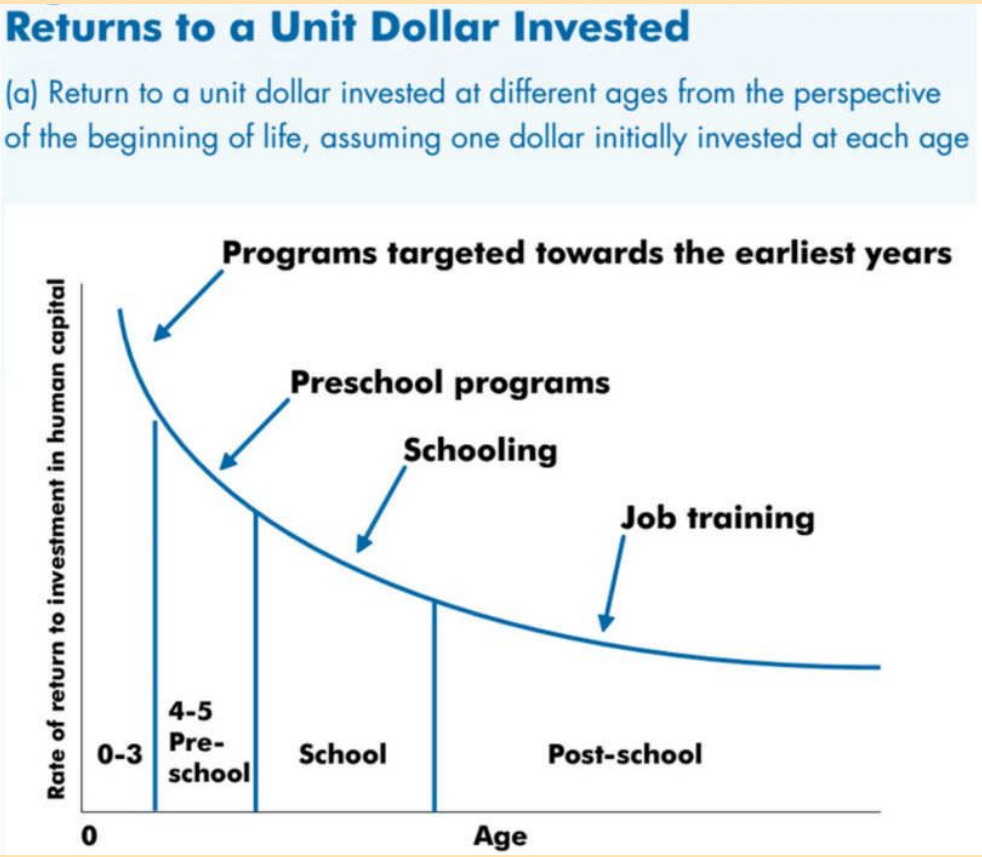
A large and growing body of research suggests that early education exerts a disproportionate impact on the development of the brain. From this perspective, warehousing millions of tiny future workers in facilities that hardly bother to stimulate them, or leaving them to stare at the television or sit in a playpen stashed in their mother's workplace, is a horrendous human-capital strategy. American day care is the economic equivalent of having rutted dirt roads for interstate highways.

University of Chicago economist James Heckman has conducted probably the most influential work in the field. Heckman has argued that the social return on investments in early childhood education can run at an annual rate of at least 14 percent a year. These programs do not merely benefit hard-pressed parents, or even their children, but society as a whole. Children who enjoyed well-designed early childhood education are less likely to need special education, commit fewer crimes (and are thus less likely to consume expensive criminal-justice-system resources), and earn more money over their lifetimes, which means they pay more taxes.

Conservative critics have disputed these findings, citing long-term studies measuring the impact of Head Start, a long-standing child-care program with uneven results. But Head Start has yielded inconsistent results because it mostly provides inexpensive babysitting, rather than high-quality education. The most exciting findings in the field suggest well-designed education for pre-kindergarten can have a transformative impact.

Heckman's findings build on the still-nascent field of brain research, the conclusions of which have overturned long-settled assumptions. A person's mental capacity, far from being fixed by nature, is deeply impressionable to its environment beginning at a very young age. American schooling traditionally begins at kindergarten, treating schooling in the years beforehand as mere babysitting. But these formative years, when the brain develops its eventual potential, may be more, not less, important. We have invested most heavily in the years with the least impact, and ignored the years with the most.

Bill Clinton's presidency invested enormous hopes in worker retraining, which the 42nd president imagined would retool the industrial workforce for the mental rigors of the new economy. Yet job training never realized the potential its advocates imagined. Early childhood education has replaced worker retraining as liberalism's human-capital strategy.



When the next Clinton candidacy takes shape, some version of the idea Obama has embraced is likely to hold a place of prominence. Economist Heather Boushey, who has studied the connection between child care and economic opportunity for more than a decade, is the executive director at the Washington Center for Equitable Growth, a think tank started by John Podesta, who is now a senior Hillary Clinton advisor. These are the sorts of transmission channels that turn ideas into platforms.

In addition to its emerging status as party doctrine, early childhood education solves several of Hillary Clinton's messaging problems at once. Affordable child care as a social issue appeals to the working poor all the way through to the upper middle class. It lends policy heft to her status as potentially the first female president in American history. And it would undergird a forward-looking economic program, simultaneously attacking the problem of stagnant opportunity for working parents and their children.

It took 65 years from the time Harry Truman proposed universal health care for Obama to sign a law actualizing his vision. Universal child care may not happen in the next presidential administration, which will begin with the same implacable Republican Congress that makes Obama's proposal dead on arrival. But it will eventually happen, and probably in less time.

LEAGUE OF CONSERVATION VOTERS

John,

I want to extend an invitation to you to join the League of Conservation Voters & LCV Action Fund for our next Environmental Majority Council conference call on Tuesday, October 2nd from 1:30pm to 2:30 pm EST. We will be joined by Senator Jon Tester, candidate for re-election to the U.S. Senate in Montana.

To RSVP and receive the call-in number, please contact Josh Hicks at (202) 454-4565 or email him directly at Josh_Hicks@lcv.org .

This is an exclusive opportunity to hear the latest on the race for the U.S. Senate in Montana, and you will have a chance to pose questions to Senator Tester directly. This race continues to be incredibly close.

As I write, seven battleground U.S. Senate races with critical implications for our environmental future are virtually tied, and we will provide you an update and assessment of these races. Finally, we will update you on LCV's latest legislative battles during the call.

Will you join us on October 2nd from 1:30pm to 2:30pm EST? To RSVP and receive the call-in number, please contact Josh Hicks at (202) 454-4565 or email him at Josh_Hicks@lcv.org .

I hope that you can join us for this exclusive opportunity.

Sincerely,

Gene Karpinski
President, League of Conservation Voters

John I am telling you these CNN debates/townhalls are perfect. Not only good and instructive but establishes the differences between the two with respect.Highlights : Hillary coming our first on the car bailout and avoiding the Nafta attack;the answer on Obama raising money always stops Bernie;on guns perfect;on money for infrastructure more clear than him; on Flint and more,she won; the best, her spontaneous answer on prayer and God. From the heart, real and beautifully delivered.

Attachments:	158 Lobbyists.doc Lobbyist Timeline.doc

Like Bush, McCain Favors Special Interests over American Interests

From top to bottom, Senator McCain's campaign is run by lobbyists who make millions representing special interests instead of American families. These lobbyists, who McCain has called "good people," have made millions by advocating for Big Oil and insurance companies, Iraq contractors and white washing the crimes of dictators. See attached research.

McCain has a history of doing favors for lobbyists, from the Keating Five scandal to favors for Paxson, McCain has been a long-time advocate for special interests that benefit him. Being admonished by the Senate Ethics Committee for personally profiting from a real-estate deal didn't curb McCain's favors for lobbyists.

McCain has had at least 158 lobbyists, working for or raising money for his presidential campaign. These lobbyist advisers have made millions advocating for big oil, insurance companies, Iraq contractors and white-washing the crimes of dictators.

- McCain campaign changes policy for employing lobbyists. In May, McCain's campaign manager and former lobbyist Rick Davis claimed the campaign would not employ any registered lobbyists; yet last night Rick Davis assured Katie Couric that whether one is a lobbyist is not a "litmus test for employment".

McCain puts Big Oil's profits before families struggling to get by.

- After McCain adopted Bush's off-shore drilling policy, donations from the oil and gas industry flowed to McCain's campaign. According to the Washington Post , McCain received more than $1 million from the oil & gas industry last month – more than three fourths coming after he reversed his position on drilling.
- Like Bush, McCain is surrounded by Big Oil lobbyists. At least 29 top advisers or fundraisers for McCain's campaign have lobbied for Big Oil. They have represented 4 of the 9 oil companies in the 2008 Fortune 200.
- Like Bush, McCain offers billions in tax cuts for Big Oil, but no relief for families. According to the Center for American Progress Action Fund, McCain's tax plan gives nearly $4 billion in tax breaks to the top five American oil companies, but gives families very little. Economists have panned McCain's gas tax holiday, saying it won't help families with gas prices.

I think that was a reference to the past not the future, but will keep my eyes on it.

Did Kristina give you the memo to the President I did? Worth giving to him? If the answer to that is yes, and you haven't forwarded, I might send you a two paragraph addendum of additional items. One relates to "other tough environmental issues" which I forgot to include--ozone and waters of the U.S. The other is a suggestion that Brian attend the PDB. A lot of business gets done there and having insight into the Susan, Lisa juju would be helpful to you, I think. I never raised it for me because I thought Susan would feel squeezed, but I think she wouldn't worry so much about Brian. What do you think?

How's Hillary doing? Wish we could tell you

I've been inside Hillary Clinton's national campaign headquarters in Brooklyn.

I've talked with "senior officials" about her bid for the White House. They sat in these chairs.

Wish I could tell you more. But they said very little.

Notice that I typed very little and not "very little," because under the ground rules of Thursday's briefing reporters were not allowed to quote their words directly.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

You're not missing much.

The former secretary of state plans to kick off the heavy-rhetoric stage of her campaign on June 13. I can't say where or what time because the senior officials wouldn't say.

She plans to lay out some policy proposals after that. Can't say which ones.

She'll take questions from reporters. Can't say how often.

She'll start having rallies. Not too many, because the election's a long way away. But some.

She might take a summer vacation, which means reporters covering her can, too. Don't know when, but one senior official observed that summer vacations traditionally occur in mid-August.

Her aides are organizing furiously in the early battlegrounds of the nomination fight (Iowa, New Hampshire, Nevada, South Carolina) because they are competing in every state. They take the primary challenges of Bernie Sanders, Martin O'Malley and perhaps others very seriously.

They are also taking their Republican opposition very seriously—some in the sprawling GOP field more seriously than others. Can't specify which ones.

They are raising lots and lots of money and are pleased with how much is pouring in. But they absolutely, positively are NOT seeking to raise $2 billion, which some journalists have reported is their goal.

They are building a large digital constituency for their efforts to communicate and mobilize voters on social media. Are they starting with the lists from President Barack Obama's organization, and Hillary Clinton's 2008 campaign? Can't say for sure, but they're exploring lots of lists.

Her husband, Bill, and daughter, Chelsea, will play roles in her campaign. Can't say exactly what, or when.

She's feeling more in control of her campaign effort this time around, unlike 2008 when she sometimes felt the campaign was controlling her.

Controversies over her emails as secretary of state or the Clinton Foundation have not inflicted significant political damage. That's because voters who might support her see the controversies as politically motivated.

She might even be able to expand the roster of battleground states beyond those Obama targeted. Can't say which ones.

I'd show you pictures of the office and desks where campaign officials do their jobs, but the post-briefing tour was deemed off-the-record.

There will be more briefings, however. Stay tuned.

Subject:	[big campaign] Rock the Vote Launches Health Care ad

Hi. I wanted to make sure you saw all this... today Rock the Vote is launching our health care ad campaign with a national ad buy on MTV, BET and Comedy Central. The press release is included below and here is a link to the spot: http://awe.sm/1RkV

Zach Braff & Donald Faison Kick-off Rock the Vote's Health Care Campaign

Millennials demanding health care now
WASHINGTON, D.C. – Today Rock the Vote is kicking off a robust multimedia health care campaign to educate young people about their stake in the health care debate and encouraging them to participate.

The campaign launches with a 30 second television spot featuring Scrubs stars Zach Braff and Donald Faison encouraging young Americans to show they care and "demand health care now" by visiting www.rockthevote.com <http://www.rockthevote.com > or texting the keyword "HEALTH" to RTVOTE (788683). The ad uses the actors' roles as "fake doctors" to educate young people about health care reform and demand that "the suits in Washington cover more than just their own asses."

Braff and Faison's PSA reinforces to young Americans' that they have the most to gain – or lose – in health care reform. Americans between the ages of 19 and 29 have the highest uninsured rate of any age group. Nearly 1 in 3 is uninsured. In addition, half of uninsured 19- to 29-year olds work full time, but aren't covered through their jobs and can't afford health care because of low wages.

"I have always been lucky enough to have health insurance. But I have many friends who are not so lucky. If a medical crisis arose in their life, they would lose their entire savings. It is my belief that healthcare is a right, not a privilege. My hope is that our lawmakers and politicians will continue to work towards ensuring that every American, no matter how rich or poor, has access to affordable healthcare." said Zach Braff.

"It's important that Washington listens to young Americans now and not just when they need their votes," said Donald Faison.

According to a recent Survey USA poll, 91% of young people ages 18-34 are paying attention to the health care debate and are most supportive of the public option (overall 58% of American say it is "extremely important," but among 18 to 24 year olds that jumps to 68 percent and 65 percent for 25 to 29 year olds).

"Young Americans are living and breathing the health care issue, most of them hoping every day that they will not suffer an accident or illness that will put them in deep debt for years to come," said Heather Smith, President, Rock the Vote. "Twenty two million young Americans voted in the 2008 election, and they will continue to vote for those that represent their interests."

In addition to the television ad, Rock the Vote is will release additional online videos to educate, entertain and provide ways for young people to speak out and take action.

Rockthevote.com includes information about the key issues of health care costs, affordability and coverage and provides updates on the latest news articles and current status of the bill through a "Vitals" section of the site

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

(http://www.rockthevote.com/issues/health-care.html). Visitors can also take action by signing the “Yes We Care” pledge demanding health care reform, emailing their local officials, and by showing their support through purchasing one of the exclusive health care t-shirts designed by Andrew W.K., Perez Hilton and RTV’s design contest winner.

The 30 second broadcast spot, as well as the online viral videos and select campaign elements were developed by the agency Citizen Group, San Francisco (www.citizengroup.com). Agency creatives Steve Fong and Robin Raj wrote and directed the spots. Through the support of Health Care for American Now (HCAN) the spot will air on MTV, BET and Comedy Central beginning September 9, 2009 and run for approximately two weeks.

About Rock the Vote: Rock the Vote’s mission is to engage and build the political power of young people in order to achieve progressive change in our country. Rock the Vote uses music, popular culture and new technologies to engage and incite young people to register and vote in every election. And we give young people the tools to identify, learn about, and take action on the issues that affect their lives, and leverage their power in the political process. Rock the Vote is creative, effective, and controlled by nobody’s agenda but our own – we tell it like it is and pride ourselves on being a trusted source for information on politics. We empower the 45 million young people in America who want to step up, claim their voice in the political process, and change the way politics is done. www.RockTheVote.com <http://www.RockTheVote.com >

Subject:	[big campaign] Request regarding Congressional campaign debates

Hey everyone,

I wanted to see if anyone is or knows of someone who is tracking House and Senate campaign debates (time/location/etc). I know some folks on this list do so with Town Halls but I'm not sure if anyone has such a list with regards to debates.

Feel free to respond off list if you prefer.

John -- John McCain said this is "a very, very tough race and a great challenge." And he's right.

I am not afraid of a tough race, and I know you aren't either.

One of our biggest challenges is having the resources we need to fight back. We must hit every goal, each and every deadline, if we want to win this Senate seat.

Your help has been incredible and I know that you are up for another challenge. I need 177 members of Team Kirkpatrick to donate $5 by midnight tonight. Act now and rush a contribution.

Subject:	[big campaign] Sara Palin Under Mines "Ethics Reform" Places Big Oil Front And Center
Attachments:	Brief Bio[1].doc Governor Sarah Palin Completely Undermines McCain.doc

Check-out some early info on Sara Palin from PAO....

Sara Palin - QUOTE OF THE DAY:

"But as for that VP talk all the time, I'll tell ya, I still can't answer that question until somebody answers for me, what is it exactly that the VP does every day?" - Sarah Palin, 8/1/08, CNBC, "Kudlow and Company"

Brief Bio and some research also attached, message points below:

SARA PALIN UNDERMINES MCCAIN "ETHICS REFORM" – BIG OIL WILL LEAD MCCAIN/PALIN NATIONAL ENERGY AGENDA

Like Bush and McCain, Sara Palin is surrounded by Big Oil and has taken oil money. McCain has had at least 29 lobbyists working or raising money for his campaign that have lobbied for big oil companies. His economic plan gives nearly $4 billion in tax breaks to the top five American oil companies.

McCain has 29 Big Oil lobbyists working for him. At least 29 top advisers or fundraisers for McCain's campaign have lobbied for Big Oil. They have represented 4 of the 9 oil companies in the 2008 Fortune 200.

Palin, Like McCain, Has History of Investigations and Ties to Lobbyists – Palin's Office is Currently Under Investigation

Governor Palin's Office is Currently Under Investigation

Palin has close ties to Senator Ted Stevens who was indicted for - and is currently awaiting trial on - his business dealings and campaign contributions.

McCain has 159 LOBBYYISTS Advising, Bundling Money and Setting His Policy Agenda.

McCain has a history of ethics entanglements defending lobbyists, not America's families. Throughout his quarter-century in Washington, McCain has shown whose side he is on – from Keating Five to Airbus, McCain has shown he stands with lobbyists, not families.

Subject:	[big campaign] New CAP Action Bible on the Koch Brothers

Pretty much anything and everything you ever wanted to know about the Kochs.

Click through for the entire 30-page report:
http://www.americanprogressaction.org/issues/2011/04/pdf/koch_brothers.pdf

http://www.americanprogressaction.org/issues/2011/04/koch_brothers.html

Any attempt to understand the modern conservative movement will eventually lead to billionaire brothers Charles and David Koch. Using their vast wealth and connections, the Koch brothers are key players in bankrolling right-wing political action groups, think tanks, and individual politicians, using this array of political power to advance their ideological agenda of limited government and less regulation. Chances are they are part of any recent right-wing attack you have seen lately.

The Koch brothers, leaders of a vast family oil-and-gas conglomerate, use this political network to pursue their right-wing agenda at nearly every level of government. Whether they are contributing millions in campaign contributions, spending millions on lobbying, or investing millions in right-wing think tank and advocacy groups, the Koch brothers' influence is pervasive.

the Koch brothers' issue agenda

Charles and David Koch would prefer to keep their influence behind the scenes but recent reporting by the Center for American Progress Action Fund's Think Progress and a variety of media and advocacy organizations shed light on the enormous breadth and reach of their network. This report will showcase the players involved in the Koch network, where they operate, and the vast amounts of money involved. The report also exposes the Koch right-wing ideological agenda that often protects their business interests at the expense of everyone else.

But cutting to the chase, here is a brief summary of the report's findings:

- The Koch brothers, whose wealth, when combined, is the fourth highest in the nation, run one of the largest private companies in the country. Koch Industries is involved in industries ranging from oil and gas, refining and chemicals, minerals, fertilizers, forestry, consumer products, polymers and fibers, and ranching. They have operations in 45 states.
- The Koch brothers use their considerable wealth to bankroll the right wing, including the Tea Party. This serves the purpose of furthering not only their right-wing ideology but also their bottom line. Koch Industries has a lot to gain from gutting government oversight and electing candidates who oppose government regulation, especially in the oil-and-gas industry.
- Chances are the Koch brothers are part of any recent right-wing attack as of late as they have fought health reform, Wall Street reform, collective bargaining rights, and efforts to curb climate change, to name just a few.
- We have identified at least $85 million the Koch brothers have given to at least 85 right-wing think tanks and advocacy groups over the past decade and a half.
- Their main advocacy group, Americans for Prosperity, has chapters in 32 states and spent $45 million in the last election, predominantly to help elect Republicans.
- The Kochs donated directly to 62 of the 87 members of the House GOP freshman class.
- The Koch brothers are active at the state level, spending $5.2 million on candidates and ballot measures in 34 states since 2003. They donated directly to 13 governors that won election last year.
- The Kochs are not going away. In fact, they have already pledged to raise $88 million for the 2012 election and have started scheduling events for potential Republican presidential candidates.

As this report will demonstrate, the Koch brothers' network works hard to advance a right-wing ideological agenda that helps their businesses reap more profits at the expense of our environment, our economy, and the American middle class. Understanding how they operate is the first step in countering their efforts to reshape our nation's laws to benefit the wealthy even more than they do today.

Today's Tack On to the Cost of War – "Guard Families Fight War of Their Own"

NEW YORK TIMES
October 5, 2008
PARENTING | THE HOME FRONT
Guard Families Fight War of Their Own
By MICHAEL WINERIP
TEANECK, N.J.

MORE than anything, John and Adriana Roldan love each other and their two little boys, Brandon, 5, and Samuel, 1. And so now that Mr. Roldan, a mechanic and a building superintendent and a New Jersey National Guardsman, has been deployed to Iraq for the second time in three years, he and his wife will start lying to each other again, just as they lied their way through his first Iraq tour.

That first time, Mr. Roldan told Mrs. Roldan that as a mechanic, he never left the base in Iraq.
And Mrs. Roldan — who has taken over his job as building superintendent — told Mr. Roldan that everything was great with their son Brandon.
The truth was, Sergeant Roldan was accompanying convoys in combat zones to repair armored vehicles that broke down. "Every time we went out, we got small arms fire," he said. "I try to keep it to myself. I thought if I told her what exactly I was doing, she was going to be more worried."

As for Mrs. Roldan's lies: Brandon was 2 during that first deployment, and missed his father so much — "His two big words were 'Where's Daddy?' " — that he threw terrifying tantrums, his mother said.

"He used to bang his head against the floor, he used to bite himself, he used to scratch himself," she said. "I guess he was just mad and furious that his Daddy wasn't here and he couldn't understand, being so small."

Mrs. Roldan has developed a mantra for her husband's calls home from Iraq: "It's only a three-minute call, the lines are long, just tell them you're doing fine," she said. "Never tell them you're depressed or sad."

"Him not knowing what I do, I think it helps him through the deployment. I mean, I didn't give him no problems, I always try to be as happy as I can when he calls. I said his son was great, he never cried."

It wasn't until her husband came back that he learned the truth. Mrs. Roldan had made a video of one of Brandon's tantrums and played it for him. "John cried," she said.

left for Iraq, the largest combat deployment of the state's Guard since World War II. And it is not just the soldiers doing hard duty. During the Vietnam War, the average soldier was 19. Today the average age for the active-duty Army is 27; 55.5 percent of Army soldiers are married, as are 45 percent of the National Guard, according to a 2007 Office of Army Demographics report. For every active duty Army soldier (518,000) there is nearly one child (493,484).

In June, when Guard members (including 250 women) left New Jersey for two months of training at Fort Bliss in El Paso, Tex., before shipping out to Iraq, they left behind 1,400 children, according to Amanda Balas, the state Guard's youth coordinator. And that number is growing. "I know of 20 more since," said Ms. Balas, who sends handmade quilts to newborns of deployed soldiers.

Original Iraq War Purchase Price:

"The administration's top budget official [Mitch Daniels] estimated today that the cost of a war with Iraq could be in the range of $50 billion to $60 billion." -- New York Times, 2/2/03

"The oil revenues of Iraq could bring between $50 and $100 billion over the course of the next two or three years. We're dealing with a country that can really finance its own reconstruction, and relatively soon." - Former U.S. Deputy Secretary of Defense Paul Wolfowitz [Congressional Testimony, 3/27/03]

"[F]rom the standpoint of the Iraqi people, my belief is we will, in fact, be greeted as liberators." - Vice-President Dick Cheney [Meet the Press, 3/16/2003]

Current Iraq War Price Tag:

4,176 Fallen U.S. Soldiers [Source: icasualties.org]

$558+ Billion [Source: National Priorities Project]

"The Iraq adventure has seriously weakened the U.S. economy, whose woes now go far beyond loose mortgage lending. You can't spend $3 trillion -- yes, $3 trillion -- on a failed war abroad and not feel the pain at home." -- Joseph E. Stiglitz, Nobel Prize Winning Economist and professor at Columbia University

Additional Costs:

• Over 4,100 American lives lost and rising as U.S. troops remain in the crossfire of daily Iraqi civil, religious, sectarian violence with no end in sight

• Eye off the ball of the real 'central front' against terrorism in Afghanistan

• Less safe with U.S. military stretched dangerously thin

• Shortchanged priorities here at home, from education to healthcare for children and veterans, while trillions of dollars spent in Iraq

• Economy in shambles as massive financial drain of war exacerbates the credit crisis

• Skyrocketing gas prices due to instability in the Middle East

• Less prepared to respond to emergencies and disasters at home with National Guard resources bogged down in Iraq

• Underfunded veterans healthcare system overwhelmed with incoming injured, maimed, and veterans suffering from PTSD

• Military families torn apart

Just talked to Jennifer Duck—about our favorite son. He's meeting with OSC today, which is good and a step in the right direction, but nothing yet public. Jennifer said she'd heard—but second/third hand (and not from son) that IC IG was handing out anti-HRC clips to journalists. Have we gotten any inkling of that happening? I certainly haven't, and it seems weird.

Subject:	BREAKING: McCain's "toughest challenger"

“Rep. Ann Kirkpatrick is the toughest general-election challenger McCain has ever faced…”
-- National Journal, 12/28/2015

John,

If that phrase sounds familiar, it’s because John McCain himself has said much of the same thing.

We just made National Journal’s top 12 Senate races most likely to change hands in 2016. We’re giving McCain a run for his money -- but he’s got a lot of special interest allies with a LOT of money to spend.

If we’re going to stay strong, we need all hands on deck.

We still short of our $60,000 FEC goal with only 2 days to go before the deadline. Every $5 or $10 gets us closer to our goal. If you can, make a contribution.

2015 has been a great year for us. From the minute Ann announced her candidacy, we rolled up our sleeves and got to work. That’s how McCain went from a shoo-in for re-election to the toughest race of his career.

We need to keep up this pace. Which means we absolutely need to reach our $60,000 goal in the next 2 days.

There’s not much time left. If you can, give today.

Thanks.

Team Kirkpatrick

This economy is crazy. What is happening here? This has to push Bush to the absolute bottom and earn him the moniker of worst president ever.

Mike -

Denis and I were chatting and we thought that it would be good to get Jim S in the mix for a meeting with O, for a # of reasons:

1) O may end up prefering Jim over the other guy, 2) we want Jim to have a key role/big job no matter what the outcome of #1 and 3) the other guy could say no.

Jim was on the trip, but his ability to spend much time with O was quite limited. Despite all of us expressing our high regard for Jim, there is no substitute for a little face to face time w/ Jim. Another option might be to put Jim on the plane for a leg, under the guise of him briefing O on an issue (like McFaul did). O you can have a failry private chat on the plane at the table.

Thoughts?

John --

Don't forget: You're invited to join President Obama at the Capital Hilton next Thursday.

Last night, President Obama delivered his first State of the Union address, laying out a bold vision to rebuild the middle class and finish the job on health reform.

And he made it crystal clear: We don't quit. We're going to keep fighting to put folks back to work and build a stronger nation.

The President is fired up, and I hope you are too. Don't miss this unique chance to hear from him in person -- RSVP now:

Friend,

Dee Dee has always had a way with words, and once again, she's right on the money -- the best way to celebrate last week's historic moments is by getting right back to work.

If we want a House of Representatives that puts people ahead of politics -- and ideas ahead of ideology -- we've got to put the Speaker's gavel back in Nancy Pelosi's hands. If we want to keep our firewall of Democratic women senators, hold the GOP accountable, and stand up for our progressive ideals, we've got to re-elect Jeanne Shaheen and Kay Hagan. And if we want a last line of defense against the War on Women in the states, we must fight to elect Democratic women governors. And we've got to start today.

Now's your chance to become an EMILY's List member for the special, limited-time rate of just $10. If we want to make history again in 2013 and 2014, the heavy lifting starts today.

We've shown the world what we can accomplish when we come together behind our strong, pro-choice Democratic women. We can do it -- and more -- again, but not without you. Join the fight by locking in your EMILY's List membership today for just $10.

Thanks for being a part of this dedicated and inspiring community.

All the best,

Amy K. Dacey
Executive Director

Amy,

Like you, I spent the wee hours of Wednesday, November 7th glued to my TV and Twitter feed, watching one pro-choice Democratic woman after another move into the "WIN" column.

I had never been more proud to be a member of the EMILY's List community -- until now.

An all-time high of twenty women -- including newly elected Senators like Elizabeth Warren, Mazie Hirono, and Tammy Baldwin -- took the floor of the U.S. Senate. And 16 new pro-choice Democratic congresswomen were sworn into the most diverse and inclusive House in history.

Yes, this week we celebrate -- and then we get back to work. We've got to re-elect Senators Kay Hagan and Jeanne Shaheen, while recruiting the candidates who will help us take back the House and win key governors' races in 2014. We've got to make critical early investments in research and training. And we can't do any of it without you.

Click here to become an EMILY's List member now for the special, limited-time rate of just $10. We're fired up and ready to build on our successes, but we can't do that without your strong and early support.

House Republicans are already back to putting politics ahead of people -- risking dire consequences during fiscal cliff negotiations before threatening to turn their backs on those affected by Hurricane Sandy. They even went so far as to end the session without reauthorizing the Violence Against Women Act. If John Boehner's stumbling and Eric Cantor's sniping are what Republicans call leadership, it's time for a new leader -- and I have a particular Bay Area progressive powerhouse in mind.

That's right, we need to get the Speaker's gavel back into Nancy Pelosi's capable hand -- and elect the women who will fight for women, families, and our progressive values while holding Republicans accountable for their reckless, retread agenda.

We can do all of this -- and make history again in 2014 -- but only if you join the fight and become an EMILY's List member today for the special rate of just $10.

If you like the sound of "Speaker Pelosi" -- and want to send the Far Right packing in 2014 -- lock in your EMILY's List membership today for just $10.

EMILY's List has been in front of the pack year after year - recruiting top candidates, helping lead the conversation about progress and priorities, and turning out the women voters who put Democrats over the top.

That's why I'm standing with EMILY's List today. They're smart, innovative, and unrelenting -- and the challenges we face heading into 2013 and 2014 require nothing less. I hope you'll join us by becoming an EMILY's List member today.

Thanks for all you've done to make this historic week possible.

Sincerely

Just a reminder to everyone...

Early voting changes political strategies, voter habits

Posted by Elizabeth Auster /Plain Dealer Washington Bureau September 26, 2008 23:24PM

If Barack Obama and John McCain seem to be trying to win your vote earlier than any presidential candidate has before, it's not your imagination.

For the first time in a presidential election, registered voters across Ohio can cast ballots early -- beginning Tuesday -- without giving any of the reasons required in the past. All you need to do is mail in an absentee ballot or show up in person to vote at your county Board of Elections or another site chosen by the board.

"It changes everything for everybody," said Medina County Democratic Chairwoman Pam Miller.

For voters, the option to cast ballots early offers the chance to avoid not only long lines at polling places on Election Day, but also the risk of a snowstorm, last-minute business trip or some other emergency. For campaigns and political activists, it means that expensive efforts that once waited until closer to Election Day are already under way -- from advertising and canvassing to organizing rides for people who want to vote.

"All of our grass-roots activity at this point is focused on early voting," said Paul Lindsay, a McCain spokesman in Ohio.

"It's going to be a major part of our effort in Ohio," Obama spokesman Isaac Baker said. "We plan to turn out a significant and substantial number of our voters during the early-vote window. That way those people on Election Day will be able to volunteer on our behalf and help turn out other voters."

Nationally, more than 30 states this year are allowing voters to cast ballots in person or by mail without a stated reason before Election Day, according to the Early Voting Information Center at Reed College in Oregon. In Ohio, the secretary of state's office expects a quarter or more of votes to be cast early.

In some counties, the numbers may be even higher. Lake County Republican Chairman Dale Fellows said he's anticipating between one third and 40 percent of voters will cast ballots before Election Day.

"A lot of people are looking at it as a convenience thing," he said.

To encourage early voting, both presidential campaigns have mailed applications for absentee ballots to voters they have identified as likely supporters -- especially voters who don't have a history of voting consistently and who are likelier to vote if they can pick a time they find convenient.

For the Obama campaign, early voting could be helpful in boosting turnout among newly registered young and black voters who are balancing classwork or child-care obligations that can make it hard for them to show up on Election Day. For the McCain campaign, it could be helpful with independents who are drawn to the candidate's maverick image but aren't in the habit of voting regularly.

The McCain campaign has mailed out more than a million absentee-ballot application forms in Ohio, Lindsay said. The Obama campaign, Baker said, has sent out "a very substantial number," which he wouldn't specify for strategic reasons.

For voters willing to cast ballots weeks before the campaign is over, one advantage is that they're less likely to be interrupted afterward by phone calls and knocks on the door from campaign activists. The McCain campaign, for example, is using new technology that will instantly eliminate voters from the list of people to contact once they say they have cast ballots.

But there are also potential disadvantages to voting early. One is that voters can't change their choices if they become disenchanted with a candidate's performance later in the campaign or if a major event, such as a financial collapse, war or terrorist attack, were to occur.

"You have to wonder how many people vote in early October and then something happens in late October and they would've changed their minds," Fellows said.

Another potential disadvantage is that early voting in Ohio, even in-person voting, requires filling out an absentee-ballot application, which entails submitting more information than is necessary at the polls on Election Day.

The application requires voters to provide their home address, date of birth and either a driver's license number, the last four digits of a Social Security number or a copy of a current ID.

Athens County Democratic Chairwoman Susan Gwinn, who formerly served on the Elections Board in her southern Ohio county, said it's not uncommon for people to make mistakes that aren't caught before they cast their vote -- and such mistakes can result in their ballots not being counted. College students sometimes mistakenly put in their parents' address, and voters sometimes write the current year instead of their birth year, she says.

When early voting first started in 2006, "there were people who were Ph.D.s whose ballots weren't counting," she said. "Those little errors add up."

In the 2006 election in Ohio, 707,856 absentee ballots were cast, representing nearly 17 percent of all votes tallied in the state. But only 639,416 of the absentee ballots were counted, making for a 10 percent rejection rate because of errors or other problems, according to the secretary of state's records.

Gwinn said she fears the chance of errors is so high that it makes sense for party activists to push early voting mostly for sporadic voters who aren't a good bet to show up at the polls on Election Day.

"The worst thing we could do is push our base out to vote absentee," she said.

WJC and Tsipras couldn't connect this morning because Tsipras already had entered some discussions but we got some feedback from him.

The 18 Eurozone leaders will meet on Sunday at 4pm, followed by a meeting of the 28 EU leaders at 6pm. Some members of the Eurogroup were pushing for a conclusion that would have given a mandate to begin formal negotiations; but other member states, particularly the Germans and the Finns, refused to sign on. While officials have not acknowledged the veracity of the document, its contents match positions that the German finance ministry has taken in the past, and hence it underscores Chancellor Merkel's challenge in managing her own domestic politics surrounding Greece. Importantly, however, we are hearing that most of Greece's European creditors have now accepted that debt relief will be necessary in any new program, though reportedly a number of countries are concerned about the magnitude of this relief. The most likely option is extending the maturity of Greece's debt and further reducing interest rates, as Germany has indicated that providing outright nominal hair-cuts is a redline. For the Greeks, this will make passing and implementing reform more palatable, but for Greece's European creditors it will further complicate the politics of providing Greece with

Roll Call: The 10 Most Vulnerable Senators

6. Sen. John McCain, R-Ariz., 5th term

McCain is entering his third decade in the Senate, but with a presidential race at the top of the ticket, Arizona will likely be targeted by national Democrats this year who would offer organizational support to drive voters to the polls.

McCain has a strong challenger in Democratic Rep. Ann Kirkpatrick, who represents the only tossup district, which Mitt Romney won with 50 percent of the vote. The DSCC and EMILY's List have both pledged to support her effort.

Kirkpatrick Cornbread

During the holidays, families and friends share time, fond memories, and of course -- FOOD. Today, we've got a recipe for you, straight from the Kirkpatrick family kitchen: Ann's cornbread.

Tamale Corn

- Start with your favorite cornbread recipe - using white corn meal
- Add 1 can of creamed corn
- Add 2-3 cups of sharp cheddar cheese
- Add 3 tablespoons of green chiles or hot salsa
- Pour the mixture in a buttered 9 by 13 inch baking pan and sprinkle with the remaining cheddar cheese
- Bake at 350 degrees for approximately 45 minutes or until golden brown

Subject: Quinnipiac Push Back

Talking points on Quinnipiac below.

- As a general rule, we put very little stock in public polls because they rarely employ an accurate model of the electorate. They allow demographics and party ID to swing markedly without making corrections, which leads to inaccurate and inconsistent polling.

- This is not the first time Quinnipiac polls in swing states have produced data that is out of step with actual results.
  - In 2012, their final Colorado poll showed Mitt Romney winning that state by a point. In reality, President Obama won Colorado by 5 points.
  - Similarly, in Virginia, they underestimated President Obama's margin of victory by two points.

- Their refusal to apply a consistent and rigorous likely voter model also led to variable polling in the 2014 cycle:
  - Their final poll in the Iowa Senate race had Ernst and Braley tied. Ernst won that race by 8.5 points.
  - Their final poll in the Virginia Senate race had Senator Warner ahead by 9 points. He won by less than a point.
    - And in the 2013 Governor's Race, they predicted McAuliffe would win by 6 points, when he won by 2.5
  - In Colorado, where Governor Hickenlooper won by 3 points, Quinnipiac had his opponent, Republican Bob Beauprez up by 2-5 points in the final weeks of the campaign.
  - And in the Colorado Senate race, they had the race swinging from Gardner 46/ Udall 39 (+7) to Gardner 45/ Udall 43 (+2), over the course of 10 days. (Final result was Garner 49/Udall 46).

- Their current polls build on these flaws to produce results that tilt the scales against Secretary Clinton. In particular, they allow party ID to swing significantly from poll to poll. Party ID does not swing wildly from month to month – and if it is, your data is not credible.

- In Virginia - where Quinnipiac has Clinton running 2-3 points behind the major Republican candidates - their poll is 5 points less Democratic than their own April poll and 6 points less Democratic than the 2012 exits.

- In Colorado – where they have Clinton 5-9 points behind – they have 7 points fewer Democrats than the 2012 exit polls keeping Republican party ID stable. And they have a 5 point swing in Party ID from their own April poll.
  - Additionally, they have a lower number of Hispanics in their poll than in the 2012 exits (11 vs 14), in a state where the Hispanic population is on the rise.

- In Iowa - where they have Secretary Clinton 6 to 8 points behind the Republican candidates – their poll has Democratic Party ID 6 points lower than the 2012 exits.
  - Additionally, they have a 4 point spread on gender (48% men / 52% women) when that state had an 8 point gender spread in 2012 (46% men / 54% women)

	Party ID Democrat / Republican
	Current Poll	April Poll	2012 Exits
VA	Dems: +1 (28 / 27)	Dems: +6 (32 / 26)	Dems: +7 (39 / 32)
IA	Dems: -2 (27 / 29)	Dems: -1 (29 / 30)	Dems: even (33 / 33)
CO	Dems: -3 (26 / 29)	Dems: +2 (28 / 26)	Dems: +4 (33 / 29)

This year Senator Sanders was voted the fourth most liberal Senator in the United States of America. Ahead of him, in third, was the Democrat's candidate for vice president, Joe Biden. Suggest WJC think very carefully about a strategy of literally ignoring Trump when he campaigns in Iowa and New Hampshire. It will take more discipline than politicians usually have, but it might be the most powerful and effective strategy.

Trump is very predictable. The media is very predictable, they will megaphone Trump taking cheap shots at WJC. My suggestion would be for WJC to have ready a litany of "responses" such as "Hillary and I spend a lot of time discussing how to create huge numbers of new jobs and get wages higher and lift up the poor to join the middle class....."

The one thing that WJC has, that nobody else has, is that he is a very highly regarded and very successful former president....this is platinum in our politics today.....Trump will try to draw him into a give and take....ignore him and keep reverting to the big issues where HRC has something to offer the voters that they care about and WJC is the proof positive than she can do it, because they have both done it before....

Sooner or later someone in the media will overreach quoting Trump against WJC.....the media is about as popular as the bird flu, but no need to attack the media to make the point.....WJC can deflect with a light touch.....look Chuck our country has a lot of people who want good jobs and higher wages and a better standard of living and I know what it's like to be president be responsible for lifting them up....and Hillary knows because she was there with me, she was my full partner when I was president, and she has been doing it herself in every job she's every had throughout her lifetime.....we're choosing a president, not a supporting actor in a reality TV show, and I hope you guys in the media get it but either way that's what I'm going to talk about....let Donald talk about whatever he wants to, I always appreciated his support when I was president and Hillary appreciated his support when she was Senator....and Donald can talk about what he wants to, and we'll talk about the things we care about.... and we'll trust the voters to decide the kind of president they want.....

Make the bastard look like a dwarf, in the way only a former president can.....

Though my Hillary beats the bully column is getting a very big play :)

When Hillary Clinton said she was going to hit the road, she meant it.

The newly declared presidential candidate is on her way to Iowa, from New York, in a van after announcing her candidacy online Sunday afternoon.

The former secretary of state, who is trying to become the first female president, is set to appear in Iowa — the influential early-voting state — on Tuesday for a series of small, private events.

While she has no planned stops on her road trip — which was her own idea — the candidate stopped by a gas station in Pennsylvania on Sunday.

Clinton's much-anticipated launch came in the form of a web video on Sunday afternoon, ending months of speculation about her intentions. Her campaign kick-off is expected to include a series of low-key events with private citizens, as opposed to large speeches — and her road trip reflects that plan. The presumptive Democratic front-runner is not planning any major speeches or campaign rallies until May.

Press Frustration With McCain Bubbles Over: Is This The 'No Talk Express'? (Huffington Post 9/23/08)
By Sam Stein
Relations between John McCain and the press corps that was once described as his "base" have fully deteriorated. After an appearance in Strongsville, Ohio, on Tuesday, the Senator blissfully ignored questions about the bailout plan from nearby reporters, prompting one journalist to scream out: "Has your bus become the No Talk Express?"

McCain Stands By Fiorina (NYT blog 9/23/08)
By Elisabeth Bumiller
Only last Friday, Senator John McCain was demanding that two former Fannie Mae executives and supporters of Senator Barack Obama, Franklin Raines and James Johnson, give back more than $20 million they each received in golden parachutes from the troubled company. "In a McCain-Palin administration, there will be no seat for these people at the policy-making table," Mr. McCain declared. "They won't even get past the front gate at the White House."

It all adds up to a campaign that seems to think it should be handed over the keys to leadership of the Free World without having to answer straightforward, substantive, tough questions from the Fourth Estate.
That's called lack of accountability.

McCain and Israel (Time 9/23/08)
By Joe Klein
The sheer arrogance of the McCain position is stunning; his inability to separate himself from the neoconservative extremists on any foreign policy issue raises major questions about his alleged foreign policy expertise. And, once again, it should be made clear this Likudnik-neoconservative tendency represents the thinking of a small minority of American Jews.

Keating Comes Up in Guilt-by-Association Game (Wall Street Journal 9/23/08)
By Nick Timiraos
The presidential campaigns' war rooms are engaging in some political brinkmanship as they raise the stakes in the guilt-by-association game.

The latest salvo came on Monday when an Obama spokesman, Bill Burton, invoked Charles Keating in hitting back at the McCain campaign for suggesting that Barack Obama had received a pass from the press. Burton said John McCain had been little scrutiny of his association to Keating despite being "centrally involved" in "the last major financial regulatory crisis, resulting in a huge bailout."

Into the wild of Wasilla, Alaska, where Sarah Palin once ruled (LA Times 9/23/08)

By Steve Lopez

"She doesn't believe in science, and her father was a science teacher," Munger said. "She told me she felt she would see Jesus in her lifetime."

If true, that's a little scary. But no more so than her view that a woman who's pregnant because of a rape shouldn't be allowed to have an abortion, or that the Iraq war is "a task that is from God." And you have to wonder if Jesus would have sued the federal government to have polar bears removed from the endangered species list.

Palin's Troopergate Moves Getting Bad Reviews in Alaska (Times 9/23/08)

Palin won't actually cooperate with the original investigation — the one approved unanimously by a majority Republican committee in the state legislature this summer…Instead, Palin plans to cooperate with an investigator from the state personnel board. Palin's Big Oil infatuation (LA Times 9/24/08)
By Robert F. Kennedy Jr.
Now John McCain has chosen as his running mate Alaska Gov. Sarah Palin, a diligent student of Big Oil's crib sheets. She's something of a flat-earther who shares the current administration's contempt for science. Under skeptical questioning in the Senate Banking Committee on Tuesday, Treasury Secretary Henry Paulson and the Federal Reserve chairman, Ben Bernanke, gave no ground in defense of their $700 billion proposal to bail out the financial system. They also gave little reason to believe that their proposal would protect taxpayers from huge losses.

It's Judgment Day for McCain (Wall Street Journal 9/24/08)
By THOMAS FRANK
Last week, Republican presidential candidate John McCain called for a commission to "find out what went wrong" on Wall Street. It was an excellent suggestion: Public inquiries into Wall Street practices served the country well in the 1930s.
And Mr. McCain has a special advantage to bring to any such investigation -- many of the relevant witnesses are friends or colleagues of his. In fact, he can probably get to the bottom of the whole mess just by cross-examining the people riding on his campaign bus. So the candidate should take a deep breath, remind himself that the country comes first, pull the Straight Talk Express over at a rest stop, whistle up his media pals, and begin.

One other interesting note:

Jeb beats Joe by 8 in head to head
HRC beats Jeb by 6

A propos of our conversation this morning we should think at some point about "electability" in general. IF we raise stakes about consequences of GOP properly without ever saying we're the only one who can beat them… it might be something to play with later on if Bernie falters on that front.

Subject: WSJ Poll

Two things I wanted to share ---

1) HRC ratings historically have been worse when she is a candidate, which is true about everyone else --- her positive/ negative in WSJ poll has ranged only from 42 to 45 positive and 36-42 negative since June of 2014, which is about when the speculation phase began. The uptick to 42 in April, was indeed up from 36 in March but was also as high as 39 in November which is well before emails or cash stories. Suggests that this could be noise and may be worth using with reporters on background when having discussions.
2) Strategically --- We have been asking ourselves if Rs are picking up something on "national security" since they keep driving it. If WSJ poll is right, they have but it has to do with GOP primary voters.
    a. When asked the top one or two items they think should be the top priority for the federal gov't:
        i. All addults say 1) Job Creation and econ growth; 2)National Security and terrorism; 3) Deficit and Spending; 4) Health care
        ii. GOP Primary Voters from March 2012 - 1) Job creation and econ growth; 2) deficit and spending; 3)National Security, but only 20% naming as top two choice
        iii. GOP Primary Voters from April 2015 - 1) National Security and terrorism, 53% naming as top two choice; 2)deficit and spending; 3) Job Creation and Econ growth
        iv. Dem Primary Voters from April 2015 - 1) Job Creation and economic growth (61%); 2)Health care; (38%) 3)Climate Change (24% - 17% name it #1); National Security (30%; 13% as top)

They are playing to their base – I suspect Nat Security has popped with base because it has become their principle attack on Obama ---

Meet the same-sex couple in Clinton campaign video

Jared Milrad and Nathan Johnson didn't know exactly where they were getting into about three weeks ago when they agreed to help make a video on behalf of Hillary Clinton.

The Chicago couple was asked by a friend who works for Organizing for America if they wanted to participate in video of people going through big changes in life that were somehow related to Clinton, who they supported at the time as a potential presidential candidate.

"When we were first contacted, they basically told us a little bit about what they would be doing and said they were interviewing people going through big changes in life and also said that it was something affiliated with Hillary, but didn't exactly say what it would be," Johnson told the Washington Blade on Sunday during a telephone interview. "So they just mainly wanted to hear our story about that and our life and decision to get married and how we're dealing with that and how excited we are about that."

The footage for their segment of the video was filmed just outside their apartment in Chicago, where Milrad, 31, works as an attorney and social entrepreneur who founded the non-profit Civic Legal Corps, and Johnson, 30, works as project manager for a health care consulting company that conducts clinical trials for medications.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

On Sunday, when they discovered the video in which they were participating was actually the campaign announcement for the candidate they support, the couple was pleasantly surprised.

“We were really excited to see that our interview was featured in the campaign announcement,” Milrad told the Blade. “It was particularly moving to see Secretary Clinton feature a gay couple engaged to be legally married, the first of any major presidential candidate. To us, this decision demonstrates Secretary Clinton’s commitment to LGBT equality and the type of inclusive leader she would be as president.”

The video features the couple among other Clinton supporters in a segment where they hold hands as they walk down a street. Overheard is Milrad’s voice, who says, “I’m getting married this summer to someone I really care about.”

Johnson and Milrad plan to marry on July 19 in Chicago in a park adjacent to Lake Michigan, then hold a reception at Center of Halstead, an LGBT community center in the city.

For Milrad, his decision to back Clinton is based on her support for same-sex marriage and the progressive views she holds.

“We really believe that we need a progressive leader in the White House for years to come,” Milrad said. “I was also a strong supporter of President Obama, particularly on the issues that affect our generation as well as the LGBT community, whether it be marriage equality, or climate change, or raising the minimum wage. I think all those issues are something that we agree with Secretary Clinton pretty strongly on. So, we’re among many other reasons happy to support the campaign.”

Johnson said Clinton’s role in advancing women’s rights contributes to his support for her candidacy as president.

“I’ve been raised by a pretty awesome mom and my grandmother’s also pretty awesome, too,” Johnson said. “I think women’s rights is a very important thing for me. I mean [Clinton has] over the past 20 or 30 years has been obviously, internationally and domestically, a huge supporter of women’s rights and issues. She’s been very strong on that, so for me, that’s been a very important issue. And obviously here support now for same-sex marriage for LGBT couples is important reason for why I support her over any Republican candidate.”

The couple apparently isn’t the only same-sex couple in the campaign video. Toward the end, what seems to be a lesbian couple exchanges a brief kiss before the video concludes. But the identity of the other couple is unknown to Milrad and Johnson, who noted the campaign filmed the video in multiple states and locations.

Milrad and Johnson plan to contribute financially to the Clinton campaign and volunteer for her — perhaps traveling to the early primary states of Iowa, New Hampshire and South Carolina — but have no plans to work for Clinton in an official capacity as they plan their wedding and continue to work full-time.

Neither Milrad nor Johnson are new to presidential politics, but the candidate that one of the men is supporting in the 2016 election is different from before. In the 2008 election, when then-U.S. Sen. Barack Obama (D-Ill.) and Clinton were engaged in a heated Democratic primary, Johnson worked on the Clinton, but Milrad was an Obama supporter and worked for him in New Hampshire.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

The ongoing war in Iraq at the time was the reason why Milrad was an Obama supporter. Clinton had cast a vote as a U.S. senator in favor of the resolution for military engagement in the country, but Obama was opposed to it.

“It was the war in Iraq; I supported his position on that,” Milrad said. “He opposed the war in Iraq. I felt like he was quite strong on LGBT issues, although, honestly, Sen. Clinton was as well. I really liked his sort of youthful vision for the future at the time, and I felt like just given his involvement in the issues [important] to me, President Obama was the right person for the job at that moment.”

But as the 2016 election approaches, Milrad said he’s confident that Clinton is the right candidate “to continue down the path that President Obama has set us on.”

“I feel like Hillary Clinton is actually the right candidate for now, for 2016,” Milrad said. “She has someone who has been on the world stage. She most recently worked on the world stage as a diplomat and is someone who believes strongly, as Nathan said, in women’s rights, in equal opportunity for all us, in raising the minimum wage and leveling the playing field for the middle class, of which Nate and I are both a part.”

Johnson said he has yet to meet Clinton, but Milrad had the opportunity to briefly speak with her in 2008 when he was working on the Obama campaign.

“I briefly met Secretary Clinton in 2008, when she spoke after I did at a rally for then-Sen. Obama in New Hampshire,” Milrad said. “I was there to rally voters to support President Obama in the general election, and so was Secretary Clinton. She was very warm, friendly, and engaging.”

It was immediately after the election in 2008 that the couple first met. After working with the Obama campaign, Milrad went to live in Boston, where his good friend was already living with Johnson as a roommate.

“My roommate had him over for just a night out and so I got to meet Jared that night and just instantly sort of fell for him,” Johnson said. “He’s a very passionate guy with kind of different background than I had being from a small town in Michigan especially. This guy was from New York, was a Jewish gay guy and had a lot of passion in life, so I think we hit it off pretty quickly. So that was 2008 just after the campaign. We pretty much started dating right after that.”

In addition to the Clinton campaign, the couple remains interested in the litigation before the Supreme Court seeking marriage rights for same-sex couples across the country.

As a native of Potterville, Michigan, a small town about a 20-minute drive from the state capitol of Lansing, Johnson has a vested interest in overturning state bans on same-sex marriage, saying his home state’s prohibition on gay nuptials is “incredibly disappointing.”

“We’re excited Illinois allows gay marriage, but hopefully with the U.S. Supreme Court decision that will change nationally and be recognized everywhere,” Johnson said.

Johnson said they have many friends in Michigan, including a same-sex couple who decided to marry at the same time he and Milrad became engaged, but won’t actually be hearing wedding bells anytime soon.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

“They’re just going to wait until it’s allowed in Michigan to get married, and it’s just too bad they have to wait too long for that,” Johnson said.

Although Clinton has come out in favor of marriage equality, she hasn’t yet said anything about pending litigation before the U.S. Supreme Court seeking the right to marry nationwide. Her last comment on marriage was during an interview on National Public Radio in which she talked about marriage being “a matter left to the states,” stopping short a supporting a national ruling on the issue.

Milrad said he’d like to see Clinton articulate support for the constitutional right for same-sex couples to marry across the country, although he believes she already holds that position.

“I think it is important,” Milrad said. “I think she does quite frankly support the right of every same-sex couple to marry legally in this country. I think she likely will articulate it and I hope she does, but I also do think we do have a judicial system in this country. We should let it play out and I’m hopeful the Supreme Court will rule in favor of same-sex couples and their right to marry legally.”

As evidence of Clinton being “a strong supporter of our equality,” Milrad pointed to her statement via Twitter against the religious freedom measure in Indiana seen to enable discrimination against LGBT people.

“She was as far as I know, the only major presidential candidate on either side to come out in support of the non-discrimination bill in Indiana and opposed the so-called religious freedom act there,” Milrad said. “I was really happy with that and I think that’s one example of the difference between her and the Republican candidates.”

It should be noted that former Maryland Gov. Martin O’Malley, another potential Democratic candidate for president, called the Indiana law “reprehensible” and “shameful” when speaking to reporters in New Hampshire.

As the campaign season is underway, Milrad said LGBT people should pay attention to the candidate that would advocate on behalf of them and other minority groups.

“I think, from our perspective, they should be focusing on which candidates are on their side, which candidates stand up vocally, unabashedly for their equal rights, so which candidate is supporting same-sex marriage, which candidate is supporting ENDA and workplace rights, which candidate is standing up for the transgender community and against all the violence and discrimination that they continue to face around the country, which candidate is promoting our full rights and equality under the law,” Milrad said. “I think that’s incredibly important. That’s a point of distinction that I think we’ll see as the campaign season plays out between Hillary Clinton and the Republican candidates.”

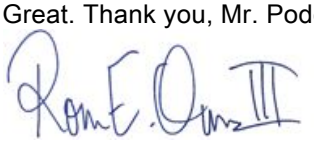
Mr. Podesta:

I wanted to provide you with an update on room arrangements if (when) Hillary comes to Michigan State University. Today, John Kasich visited MSU and spoke in a room that held around 600 students, in a town hall setting - much like Secretary Clinton's past events. The Governor spoke for about 20 minutes and then he let students bring up any questions that they may have had. I was thinking that we do something very similar?

If this is not possible before the primary, we'd still like to welcome a senior official from the campaign to come speak to the students! Here is an update on some events that are happening for us this week:

-Tomorrow, Tuesday, January 16th: Spartans for Hillary will be attending a fundraising event, hosted by Women for Hillary, in Lansing, MI. Senator Debbie Stabenow (who I worked for) will be in attendance, including Congresswoman Brenda Lawrence, Colleen Peters, Janet Blanchard, Jennifer Kildee, Pamela Levin, Barbara Levin, and many other elected officials and community leaders.
-Wednesday, January 17th: Spartans for Hillary will be holding a phone-banking session from 6-8pm. We will be accompanied by State Representative Kristy Pagan, who will give a speech to the students in the beginning, and then she will phone-bank with us!



I hope this email was informative, Mr. Podesta. I have attached photos of the John Kasich event so that you can have a visual of what I was thinking for an HRC Event, and I have also attached a flyer of the Women for Hillary Event. Please let me know your thoughts!

Best,
Ron

I want to first thank you for your great service to our nation with helping to elect Hillary Clinton as our next President of the United States! I apologize for all of the emails I send to you (the senior staff), I am just extremely passionate about getting Hillary elected and helping out in any way that I can. As you know, the Michigan Primary is approaching us very quickly, and I would love your help in making sure the State of Michigan becomes pro-Hillary!

As some of you know, I am the President and Campaign Manager of Spartans for Hillary at Michigan State University (which has over 50,000 students). Wouldn't it be fantastic if we could get all of those students out to vote for Hillary and eliminate the notion that she doesn't connect with young people?

That being said, would one of you be interested in coming in and speaking to our General Assembly about what you do on the campaign, how important it is that we win this election so that Hillary can fight for us, and, most importantly, tell a personal story about why you support Hillary?

We hope to have you come in before the primary (that way the polls will be in our favor when people go to vote on March 8th)! We meet every Tuesday from 6-7:30pm in 334A Case Hall, and if you could just speak for 20-30 minutes (this includes questions), we could dedicate the rest of the time to phone-banking! If those dates do not work for any of you, we can certainly reschedule our GA meeting.

Also, if HRC is interested in coming to speak to campus (perhaps before she goes to debate in Flint, MI) we can certainly work on that, as well! Imagine Hillary speaking to a large crowd of young people, with the energy high, and students chanting "I'm with her!" The press would love it! President Obama talked to MSU's campus when running for office, and it certainly helped him in the polls. If HRC cannot make it before the primary, we would love to have her before the general!

If you are interested in one, or both, of my propositions, please reach out by replying to this email or calling me at (989) 992-3395 . I'd be happy to speak any day of the week and at any time. I look forward to your correspondence!

Subject:	Iraq escalation campaign

Friends,

I spent a little time today going through results from Senate and House races and comparing them to our Iraq work in 2007. (See lists below.) Of the 23 wins that the DCCC has so far, 19 of them were AAEI/Iraq Summer targets in 2007. This obviously constitutes the bulk of the House wins this year. Among these districts most of them had paid organizers in them, all of them had our calling program going into them, some of them had advertising in them. Most were Iraq Summer targets as well.

In the Senate, the Iraq Campaign in 2007 targeted seven senators in-cycle. Four of them were defeated. There were other Iraq Senate targets who were not in-cycle. And other competitive Senate races this year that were not Iraq campaign targets.

It is a record to be proud of.

While obviously the work we did was advocacy, the public did fulfill part of the promise of "political extinction."

With president-elect Obama we can now hope and pray for peace.

-Tom Matzzie

want to support whoever the R nominee is. Below is an internal review of her Op-Ed.

A very clear repudiation of us. She writes: "(Republicans) want to roll back common-sense efforts to prevent conflicts of interest by financial managers."

Someone may want to point out to her campaign the obvious inaccuracies in her op/ed:

(1) it is not Republicans – it is Democrats and Republicans, and lots of them
(2) it is not a roll-back – nothing has happened yet

Read the op/ed. She also talks about the need for "tough new rules" for "shadow banking" and broker-dealers, the need for additional liquidity requirements, trading taxes, etc., etc.

She makes clear that a potential Clinton Administration would be four more years of LOTS MORE financial industry regulation. Lots of harsh rhetoric, hyperbole and vitriol. Lots of hatred towards financial services broadly. She really can't walk back from this.

Subject: Millions are Standing for a Healthy Environment - Will You?

Dear Mary,

More than two months ago President Obama nominated Gina McCarthy, a dedicated public servant with nearly three decades of experience, to be EPA Administrator. Just last week eight Senators, who are supported by Fossil Fuel Industry, attempted to score political points by boycotting a scheduled vote and keeping the nomination in limbo. This is unacceptable and we need you to let your Senators know that it's time to confirm Gina McCarthy. Click here to tell your Senators !

I know it's been a while since you have taken action with us, but I hope you'll renew your membership and make sure Gina McCarthy gets a vote by telling your Senators “I stand with Gina!” Click here to tell your Senators !

Gina McCarthy is the perfect choice to lead EPA. Throughout her career she has partnered with Republicans, Democrats, community activists, and industry to find common sense solutions to protect our water, our communities, and our health. Gina McCarthy is a pragmatic leader and her nomination has earned praise from people across the country. In fact, last time she faced a nomination in the Senate, for her current post of Assistant Administrator, she was easily confirmed by a bi-partisan majority. It’s time for the Senate to confirm Gina McCarthy so EPA can “Get to Work” – so email your Senators now.

Thousands of Americans are telling the Senate that they stand with Gina for a clean environment. Unfortunately, a small group of Senators want to use this nomination to score political points and are doing everything they can to stop it. Help us make sure these Senators don’t get their way – join the Republicans, Democrats and Independents who think it’s time for the Senate to confirm this pragmatic public servant! Email your Senators today !

For Clean Water,

Lynn Thorp, National Campaigns Director

P.S. - If we don't hear from you soon, we may have to remove you from our list. We really want to keep you up-to-date on what's happening in the fight to protect clean water - please take action today !

Press Release - For Immediate Release

Indian Embassy in Washington Starts a Series of Yoga events to celebrate First International Day of Yoga - Sri Sri Ravi Shankar Talks on 'Nurturing Peace Through Yoga and Meditation'

Embassy of India, Washington DC organized a Talk by Sri Sri Ravi Shankar on 'Nurturing Peace Through Yoga and Meditation' at the Embassy on April 29, 2015, which began a series of curtain-raiser yoga events to welcome the First International Day of Yoga (June 21, 2015).

Sri Sri Ravi Shankar emphasized the relevance of Yoga in today's world. He said that yoga is not only about flexibility in body but also about flexibility in mind and thinking. Sri Sri mentioned that wars in the world begin when communication breaks down. Yoga creates skills in communication and relating to people. The purpose of yoga and meditation is to unite hearts and minds of people and to unite religions and cultures of the world. At the end of his Talk, Sri Sri answered questions on Yoga and meditation from the audience.

The United Nations General Assembly has declared June 21st as the International Day of Yoga. Charge d'Affaires Ambassador Taranjit Singh Sandhu highlighted the words of Indian Prime Minister Narendra Modi at the United Nations: "Yoga is an invaluable gift of India's ancient tradition. It embodies unity of mind and body; thought and action; restraint and fulfillment; harmony between man and nature; a holistic approach to health and well-being. It is not about exercise but to discover the sense of oneness with yourself, the world and the nature. By changing our lifestyle and creating consciousness, it can help us deal with climate change". On December 11, India introduced a draft resolution in the United Nations General Assembly. The draft Resolution received unprecedented broad support from 177 countries and was adopted unanimously.

Government of India is planning to celebrate the International Day of Yoga in all the countries around the world, including United States. Embassy of India, Washington DC is organizing a series of events on Yoga which will culminate on June 21, 2015. The Talk by Sri Sri Ravi Shankar begins these series of events. This would be followed by curtain raiser Yoga events at the University of Maryland, Chinmaya Mission and other places during the months of May - June 2015.

On the First International Day of Yoga, June 21, 2015, Embassy of India would be collaborating with Yoga organizations, practitioners, and Community Organizations for a day-long event at the Mall, Washington DC.

(Photos and video clips of the event are being sent by the next mail)

A Field Guide to Who's Who in the Fledgling Clinton Campaign

Republicans are already clawing for spots in next year's presidential race, and so are the Democratic operatives who are meeting in Hillary Rodham Clinton's living room and her New York offices.

Mrs. Clinton, whose schedule has been unusually quiet of late, and her advisers are fielding résumés and talking to potential campaign aides (a mix of old and new). As the presumptive front-runner, Mrs. Clinton has her pick of talent. But several people with knowledge of the discussions say that some of the Democrats' most gifted political professionals have decided, for the moment, that the safest place to be is on the sidelines.

After all, in 2008, things didn't end so well for Mrs. Clinton's first campaign manager or her first chief strategist.

So here's an informal and wildly incomplete guide to the Clinton 2016 campaign as it slowly, quietly and cautiously begins to take shape (No, Mitt Romney has not called):

People to impress: Cheryl Mills, Huma Abedin and Evelyn S. Lieberman.

Doesn't tolerate drama: John Podesta.

Will run things: Robby Mook (and his mafia).

Dark horse: Stephanie Schriock of Emily's List.

Spin meisters: Brian Fallon or Jennifer Palmieri (a Podesta pick)

Money man: Dennis Cheng.

Policy wonk: Jake Sullivan.

Message makers: Wendy Clark, the Coca-Cola marketing whiz, and Roy Spence, the advertising guru based in Austin, Tex. ("Don't Mess with Texas," or Hillary.)

The X-Factor: Chelsea.

Second, since we asked you to step up, we've raised $3,103 -- not far off our $3,800 goal.

Friends -- this isn't just big news. It's MONUMENTAL. It's game-changing.

According to a new poll, Ann and John McCain are locked in a statistical tie.

This is a dead heat. We are closing in FAST on John McCain -- and we need to seize this opportunity to build on our momentum.

We need to get $3,800 into our Rapid Response Fund in the next 36 hours to capitalize on this. Can you chip in?

We've said it again and again and again: If supporters like you don't step up right now, we're going to lose this race.

- First: Hayworth wrote a $1 MILLION check
- Then: A new poll was released showing the race is TIED
- Earlier: Cook Political Report confirms – this race is a total toss-up
- JUST NOW: Roll Call said the same thing! This seat is a complete toss-up.

And still we don't have enough money to fund our GOTV operation. Our GOTV efforts will make the difference between winning and losing, and we're $4,928 short – we will LOSE if we don't hit this goal.

Please chip in $250 to get us to the goal so we can win.

I can't win without your support – Hayworth and the GOP are just pouring too much money into our race.

Can you give us a call at (845) 565-1842 or use this link to make a $250 contribution tonight? https://secure.actblue.com/contribute/page/spmrapidresponse

John,

There is no issue I'm more passionate about than education. I could not have experienced the American dream without the dedicated teachers and administrators that shaped me into the person I am today.

Everyone deserves a fair shot at the American dream. But when I became Chair of the Colorado Board of Education, I saw up close how our education system fails some students and teachers. I decided to do something about it: I opened up two charter schools to serve those with the least access to the great public education opportunities they need to succeed. These schools have educated thousands of at risk youth, immigrants, refugees, homeless teenagers, and English learners.

Today, thousands of students have come through the doors of the New America Schools and the Academy for Urban Living with a diploma in hand and a brighter future on the horizon.

Last week, I had the opportunity to make an even bigger difference by successfully passing a law that ends the No Child Left Behind era. The best part was I successfully advocated for a few Colorado-grown ideas centered around innovative learning and supporting educators.

Click to become an education champion!

But we always have more work to do. If you support improving our schools and making sure all kids get a great education, please add your name as an education champion TODAY and share your ideas to improve our education system.

I have been blessed and humbled by the opportunities our great country has provided me. But I'm concerned that it's getting harder and harder for many Americans to get ahead. And it's that same concern that drives me to fight to strengthen our public education system so that, no matter where you're born, your future is bright.

Maria also did several interviews and made supportive statements.

HRC got thunderous applause when she talked about Dontre.

Will debrief more with LaDavia but wanted to give that quick update.

And so is saying loudly and clearly that yes, black lives matter. As a mother and a grandmother, my heart breaks for the family of Dontre Hamilton. And I join Maria Hamilton, Senator Tammy Baldwin, and Congresswoman Gwen Moore in encouraging the Department of Justice to expedite the investigation into Dontre's death.

We need to restore the trust that has been lost between law enforcement and the people they serve. We need to end the violence that has cast a shadow over Milwaukee and too many of our communities. And we need to recognize that the ability of black mothers across this country to raise their children in safety is a women's issue, too.

Subject: Looking forward

Dear John,

First and foremost, I would like to wish everyone a happy, healthy and prosperous new year. This year has been one filled with both ups and downs, but every new year offers an opportunity for reflection and new beginnings. In the political world, as we kick off 2016 and the Iowa Caucus comes and goes, our attention will soon shift to the congressional races.

If you haven't already, I hope that you'll consider supporting my campaign. Please, add your name and pledge to be a supporter >>>

I look forward to speaking with all of you about my vision for a better Iowa and a more functional congress that works to give back to the people of Iowa and this great nation. As I begin to lay out my campaign platform I will highlight my positions on issues such as:

- Rebuilding our Middle Class
- Improving K-12 Education
- Making Post-Secondary Education More Affordable
- Addressing Energy and Environmental Issues
- Supporting Family Farms
- Immigration Reform

Help me send a message to my opponent that this campaign should be about real issues and positive change >>>

I look forward to running a campaign that lays out a clear path to victory in November and draws a positive distinction between myself and Steve King. I wish you all a safe holiday weekend and look forward to seeing you in 2016.

Hi John,

It was great to have breakfast before Thanksgiving. I wanted to be sure we found a time to talk to Dennis soon. As we discussed, there are new fundraising opportunities for next generation organizing as well as the potential for a stronger and more innovative DNC next generation voter engagement program. The Nov 23 NYT article on Hillary's millennial poll numbers further highlighted the importance of developing now serious solutions to the engagement question. I am actively talking with Amy and her team about this and connecting with Dennis soon would be helpful.

You also suggested I come in to NYC to talk to key members of the team. I could do next Friday December 11. Would that work?

I am cc'ing Simon Thompson who helps with my schedule and civic engagement projects and can help coordinate.

Best,

Ian

Your investment mix is off track.

Based on a review of your workplace savings plan, it looks like your current investment mix may not be appropriate for your age.*

We can help fix that:

1. We can work closely with you to help you establish an investment mix that can maximize growth opportunities and help your savings last throughout your retirement.

   OR

2. We can provide you with the online resources to manage your investments on your own.

Take the next step to get on track:

1. Call a Fidelity Representative at 800.528.4015 for a one-on-one conversation.
2. Or go online to explore the different options on your own.

Investing involves risk, including risk of loss.

*For "investment mix" purposes, your current age and equity holdings are compared with an example table containing age-based equity holdings that may be generally appropriate for many investors saving for retirement and planning to retire around age 65. The mix is designed to become more conservative as investors approach retirement and beyond. The allocations begin with 90% equity holdings within a retirement portfolio at age 25, continuing down to 24% equity holdings at age 93. Equities are defined as domestic equity, international equity, company stock, and the equity portion of blended investment options. We determine whether or not your investment mix is appropriate for your age if you are within 10% (+ or –) of the age-based equity allocation and capped at 95% equity. The analysis does not take into consideration other workplace savings plan accounts, BrokerageLink® assets, or other investments you may hold with Fidelity or elsewhere. It also does not consider other factors, such as risk tolerance, that may affect your retirement mix decision. Any assets held in managed accounts are excluded from this analysis.

ADD YOUR NAME: Call on Speaker Boehner to force Michael Grimm to resign

Michael Grimm just pleaded guilty to felony charges. It's time that Speaker Boehner do the right thing and force Grimm to resign. Agree? Add your name to our petition now.

ADD YOUR NAME

John: A little more than one month after getting re-elected to Congress, Michael Grimm agreed to plead guilty to felony charges. He's unfit to represent New York in Congress.

That's why we need your help before you head home for the Holidays. We need to send a message to Speaker Boehner that it's time to force Michael Grimm to resign his seat in Congress. But we can't do that alone. We need your help.

Can you click here and instantly add your name to our petition demanding that Boehner force Michael Grimm to resign?

Clearly Speaker Boehner needs to force Grimm out. Doing so is the only way that Boehner can stop Grimm from further embarrassing Congress and the people he was elected to represent.

But he won't force him out without pressure from people like you. That is why we need you to click here and add your name to our petition demanding Boehner force Grimm to resign.

Good evening-

Two items to highlight tonight:

1. Great news! AFT would like to set up a call next week to start discussing a endorsement roll out. They are moving forward with a target date of July 11th but nothing is confirmed. Everything looks on track for that to be the timeline. AFT would like to have political, comms, whomever you think is appropriate to discuss the strategy behind the roll out. I'm happy to pull the call together if you can let me know who and how you'd like to proceed.

2. Robby presented at the AFL-CIO Political Director's meeting today and did a excellent job! I've gotten feedback from several unions that they felt Robby's presentation was very good. Robby was asked about energy, apprenticeship tax credit, fundraising, field staffing and of course trade (CWA). Sanders' campaign presented afterward and I understand it was "respectable but didn't change any minds". Sanders emphasized his $15 million fundraising and his low dollar fundraising (under $37). If anyone would like additional details, I'm happy to provide. Those were the big take aways.

No new RSVPs today to John's HRC reception.

Our tentative plan is to use tomorrow's college event to drive a GOP contrast on higher ed. Podesta suggested that she focus our fire just on Scott Walker, which would be a little different than our normal practice and so surprise people a bit. And then the campaign can follow up afterwards with hits on the others. How do people feel about that?

She's Back: Heather Graham Returns As Public Option In New Video

As Public Option Makes Comeback, MoveOn Re-Cuts Ad From The Fall Featuring Graham As Public Option

As the public option makes a comeback in the House and Senate, a new video, by MoveOn.org Political Action, features actress Heather Graham revising her role as the public health insurance option. The video, released in advance of the White House Health Care summit, shows that the public option is making a political comeback thanks to its continued popularity with voters, and reinforces the message that the public option is the best way to help lower costs for American families and keep private insurance companies honest by forcing them to compete.

You can see the new video here: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Gn9-ktTz2Uw

Heather Graham first played the public option in a television ad released by MoveOn in October. You can see the original ad here: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=bvaJYYeXf70 .

While many thought it was dead, in the last few weeks the public health insurance option has made a remarkable comeback, with 22 Senators and 119 members of the House of Representative signing letters urging the passage of the public health insurance option through reconciliation. On Friday, Senate Majority Leader Harry Reid said that he would support holding a vote on the public option if health care moves via reconciliation, something he said on Saturday was likely.

The video, which states "the public option is making a comeback," depicts lazy and out-of-shape insurance company executives from CIGNA, Blue Cross/Blue Shield, United Health and Humana being forced to compete in a track meet with Heather Graham playing the public option.

"This video shows, in a creative way, that the public option is making a comeback: because of its popularity and because competition helps lower the price of health care," said Justin Ruben, Executive Director of MoveOn. "With insurance companies continuing to dramatically raise their rates, it's obvious that the insurance industry will not reform itself. While we wish the President had included the public option in his plan, Congress can and should act and use reconciliation to pass real health care reform including a public option."

I'm someone who -- for reasons that must have to do with a past life -- feels a lift in my heart, almost literally, when I look at the ocean or go sailing. Fresh water doesn't do it for me, perhaps because there's no salt water smell. Even Lake Tahoe seemed like an astonishingly gorgeous, scary-giant postcard, rather than something I was really at. Even when standing on the beach.

BUT the mountains, the pine trees -- what Mary describes! This was the first time in 25 years I've felt that same lift without looking at the sea. It was really something. Can't thank you guys enough.

Disappointed Mae opted for the Ivy League, but can't argue she made a mistake! And, more generally, California's dysfunction has now replaced earthquakes, terrorist/North Korean WMDs, and Boalt's capital campaign as my biggest day-to-day source of anxiety. We may have to move somewhere else. Manitoba. Maui. Majorca. Whatever.

PS: We promise to do better by Gabe this coming year. We know he's prone to idleness, delinquency, and general troublesomeness. So we'll help out as best we can. I particularly worry that whenever I pass him in the hall he is surrounded by women, and smiling. It suggests a certain lack of academic focus and serious purpose. But don't worry.

Our next trip as a family will be for two weeks around July 25 to August 8. I'll let you know as soon as we have definite dates. And don't worry about the cards. We've got more.

Dear Mary and John—thanks so much for the use of the condo in Truckee this weekend. Christopher and I (and the children) enjoyed it immensely.. We couldn't believe that we'd been here 5 years and this was the first time we had ever been in the Sierra or seen Lake Tahoe or Donner Lake---It was so beautiful. The Northwoods pool was not open yet, but Elias and I tried playing tennis for awhile which was fun, as was the hike. The instructions were quite clear, so we hope you find everything okay. We left the dirty sheets and towels in the first bathroom, and we put fresh linens on the beds. WE did open the battlestar galactic, first season DVD—I'm afraid I'm a fan and had never seen the beginning. Now it looks like my 8 year old son is becoming another sci fi fan--- Hope you enjoy the two bottles of wine we left. See you soon—and we definitely want to come up again. (PS, Christopher packed the pinochle pack of cards thinking they were ours—should we give them to Gabe?) When are you guys going to be out here? Maria

The counterpoint is that the companies took none of the concept cars they created in this program in the direction of market, and all were diesel hybrids.

The most positive assessment we found of the program came from a UC Davis professor, who found that it improved relationships between automakers and the federal government and later benefited Detroit through a 'boomerang' effect—basically all of the pomp and circumstance around the program made Japan and Korea invest even more in making efficient vehicles, which eventually boomeranged back to push Detroit forward.

Sierra Club was opposed to the program (though not with any great depth of feeling) because they agreed with Nader that it was an excuse to not push for strong fuel economy standards. (Not because they hate cars.)

Subject: The PNGV Hit

I want to raise this again, and pull John and Jen into this loop, to see what we think of this hit. I know that PNGV wasn't hugely successful, but I think Sanders is going to pound away on "Trade Ruined Detroit," and I'm not sure we have enough stuff to stop that. So I really think we need to weigh this hit as an option for the debate:

> "Yes, Senator Sanders, trade agreements have had mixed impact here. But it wasn't a trade agreement that had the Japanese car makers clean our clocks in the 1980s – it was our auto executives letting workers down, by not staying up with the latest technology. And so, my husband came up wit a plan for a partnership with Detroit to build a new generation of cars – government helping car companies get new technology to catch up and pass Japan. So the Clinton administration went to work to help Detroit. But they faced tough opposition. Republicans didn't want government help coming to Detroit. And Ralph Nader hates cars, and so, he tried to stop this partnership. And so Congress voted on killing this partnership. And when that vote was taken, you voted with Ralph Nader to kill it, while President Clinton stood with Detroit. So that's the choice you made."

I know that we then get some push back on whether PNGV worked or not (though we can say we'll never know because it was killed), and I know today we want to regulate autos, not just help their tech – but I think we are going to have a battle over who killed Detroit, and Bernie has a theory, and we need some weapons…

Sustaining Life Fellow

Q: Where were you born and raised?
A: I grew up on the Southside of Chicago, in South Shore. We lived a few blocks west of Lake Michigan. I also spent many summers up in Wautoma, Wisconsin on my Aunt's farm.

Q: If you could have dinner with anyone who would it be?
A: I would choose to dine with the Obamas, for both personal and professional reasons. I greatly admire them and appreciate their genuineness and warmth. I think it would be a wonderful evening.

Q: What is the title of the last book you read, or movie you saw?
A: Blessed are the Dead by Malla Nunn, a detective novel set in 1950's South Africa during the time when apartheid laws were first introduced. I've completed two additional books in this series, Present Darkness and A Beautiful Place to Die. The relationship between two protagonists,a tough Englishman Detective and Zulu Detective Constable, and the respect they have for each

Q: There are so many wonderful organizations to donate money to. Could you please tell us a little bit about why you continue to donate to the American Bar Foundation at the Sustaining Life Fellow level?
A: I feel it is important to support the research and programs of the Foundation, especially those addressing issues of diversity, and the pipeline to the profession. I also value the Foundation's work on perceptions of the justice system and access to justice.

Q: Can you share with us your favorite Fellows event memory?
A: I very much enjoyed the reception at the Sixth Floor Museum in Dallas. The exhibits on the political and social landscape of the sixties were fascinating and I learned a great deal about President Kennedy's assassination.

Q: Anything else you'd like to share with us?
A: I am grateful for the warm friendships and camaraderie so many of the Fellows have extended to me. I look forward to seeing you at the next Sing-A-Long at the ABA Annual Meeting.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

disproportionately affect people of color, low-income people, women, young people, and seniors. It reminds me of a saying from Arkansas: "You find a turtle on a fence post, it did not get there on its own."

But for every Republican governor working to dismantle voting rights, there are Americans determined to keep marching forward. I'm proud of the outcry in Alabama from people who have come together to demand better. It's time for Governor Bentley to listen to your voices and reverse the decision to close DMV offices in the Black Belt and other rural counties. But the reforms shouldn't stop there. Alabama is one of a handful of states with no early voting—that needs to change. Alabama should also eliminate the discriminatory and demeaning state requirement that people provide proof of citizenship along with their voter registration forms—a law modeled on one that has stopped more than 30,000 would-be voters from registering in Kansas. And they should make sure that Americans who have served time should have their voting rights restored once they're released.

Unfortunately (but not surprisingly), Alabama isn't an outlier. Over the past few years, many states have passed laws that make it harder to vote. Since the Supreme Court gutted a key provision of the Voting Rights Act, a dire situation has gotten even worse. And there are those—including many of the Republican candidates for president—who would continue to push our country in this shameful direction.

Jeb Bush says he wouldn't reauthorize the Voting Rights Act—because it's gotten easier to vote since it was passed. As Justice Ginsburg has said, that's like throwing away your umbrella in a rainstorm because you're not getting wet. Marco Rubio has supported harsh voter ID laws. John Kasich restricted early voting in Ohio—a state where 77 percent of early voters in 2008 were African American. What part of democracy are they so afraid of?

Many of the people who fought and sacrificed for the right to vote are no longer alive to witness these abuses. But we are. And we have an obligation to stop the systematic and deliberate effort to disenfranchise voters.

First, Congress should put principle ahead of politics and pass the Voting Rights Advancement Act—a bipartisan bill that would restore the full protections of the Voting Rights Act.

Second, we should set a standard across this country of at least 20 days of early, in-person voting—including opportunities for weekend and evening voting.

Third, we should go even further. We need universal, automatic voter registration—so that every young person in every state is automatically registered to vote when they turn 18, unless they choose to opt out. I applaud California for implementing this measure last week—an incredible victory in our most populous state.

These steps alone won't solve all of the challenges we face. But we owe it to future generations to fight back against attacks on voting, and to meet this moment with the bravery and determination of those who have come before us. It's time for leaders in every party, at every level of government, to be on the right side of history.

Isn't stagnant wage (for the bottom 90%) part of the reason we have rising inequality? I guess I don't see these as two separate things. But, as you know, I've always seen rising inequality as more of a problem of declining fortunes for the middle class and people trying to get into it, than a problem of too many wealthy people. I would definitely take increasing fortunes for everyone rather than poor fortunes for everyone.

you have (characteristically) gone right to the heart of the most difficult problem. In response to your specific question, over that last 15 years, the capacity of labor to demand a greater share of profits from productivity gains have been overwhelmed by several factors: 1) globalized wage competition as incomes have slowly equilibrated around the world, 2) the increasing portion of our economy that is generated by service work (as opposed to good production) that is less susceptible to productivity improvement, 3) the use of technology to generate productivity gains (so that the benefits accrue to capital rather than labor), 4) the overhang on the labor market and wages from discouraged workers who dropped out and the long-term unemployed, 5) the replacement of lost middle wage jobs with lower wage jobs, and 6) more recently, the change in the nature of work itself which is now more part-time, project (or "gig") oriented and based on an independent contractor model.

All of this had led to both stagnant wages and rising income insecurity - both of which are far more relevant than income inequality. I think some smart candidate for public office is going to figure this out and start talking about the modern economy in a way that resonates with workers' actual experience.

The public policy response can be a re-tooling of the policies that touch on work - unemployment insurance, OSHA, worker's compensation, retirement savings etc - in a way that is relevant to the modern economy, refocusses the debate in an innovative way and proves that the candidate(s) understand the world in which the voters live.

I have seen the discussion of declining productivity -- one question I have is why is it rational for workers to be more and more productive if they don't see gains from productivity in their paychecks? From an economically rationalist perspective, stagnant wages should inexorably lead to declined productivity, no? Is there an alternative view of why there's a decline in productivity? Our econ team said productivity increased 30% btwn 2000 and 2013, with no corresponding increase in wages. 30% for that time period is not great, but it's also not an historic low.

Take a look especially at pages 18-21 which detail why our labor markets are weak and how they have fundamentally changed since the Great Recession. To my mind, the big issue which the data highlights is income insecurity (rather than income inequality) to which there can be some targeted and innovative public policy responses.

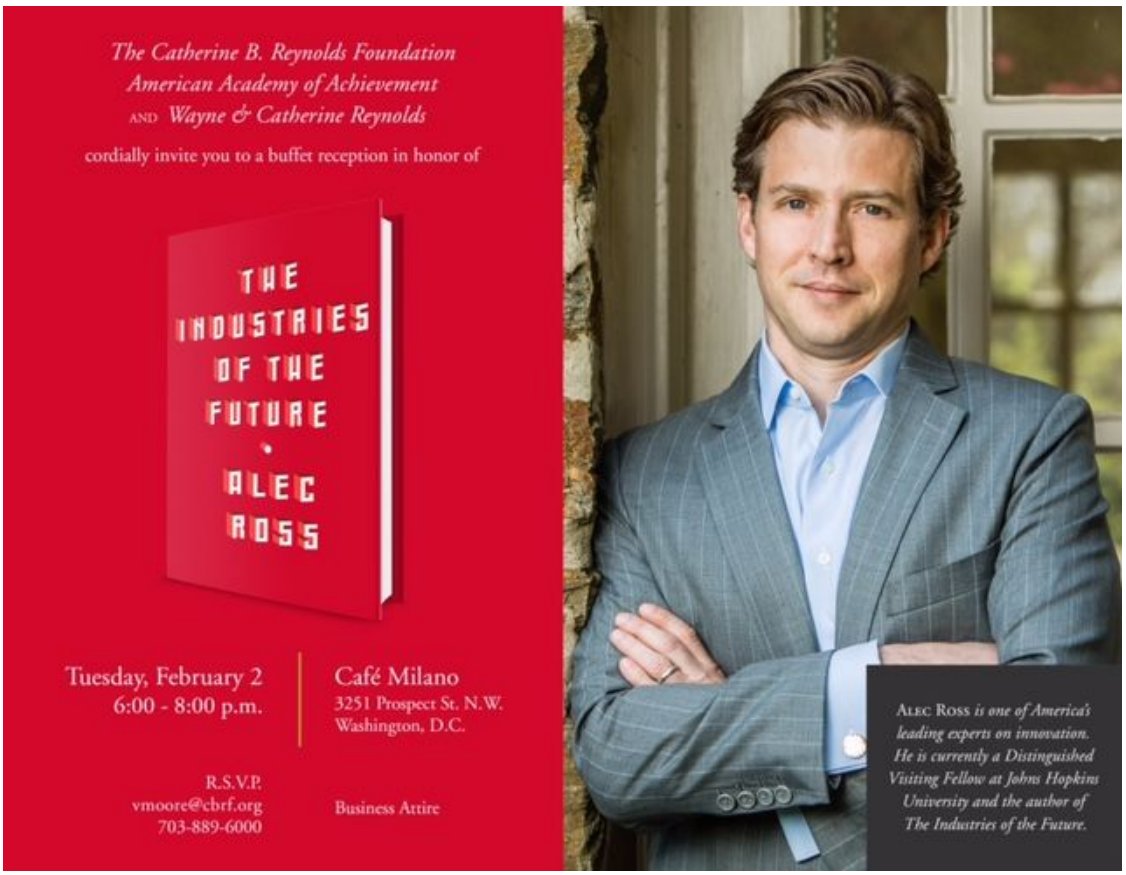
Dear Mr. and Mrs. Podesta,



Please join Wayne and Catherine Reynolds in celebrating the release of Alec Ross's new book, The Industries of the Future. While Alec was working as Senior Advisor for Innovation to Secretary of State Hillary Clinton, he traveled to forty-one countries, exploring the latest advances coming out of every continent. From startup hubs in Kenya to R&D labs in South Korea, he has seen what the future holds. Alec explains what's next for the world: the advances and stumbling blocks that will emerge in the next ten years, highlighting the best opportunities for progress and how we can navigate them.

The reception will be held in Washington, D.C. on Tuesday, February 2 from 6:00 p.m. – 8:00 p.m. at Café Milano, located at 3251 Prospect Street NW. It is business attire.

You may contact me by phone at 703-889-6000 or by email at vmoore@cbrf.org , to reply no later than January 27. Thank you.

ORGANIZING for ACTION

John --

Tuesday night was something special.

All across the country, hundreds of thousands of people were loudly standing up with Wendy Davis, the Texas state senator who spoke for 11 hours to filibuster a dangerous bill that would have closed dozens of health clinics that provide services to women across the state.

It was a rare -- and if the other side has their way, temporary -- victory in that fight. Texas Governor Rick Perry has already scheduled a special legislative session so they can bring it up again next week.

Here's OFA's message for them: We're still standing with Wendy, and we're not backing down.

If you're standing up for women in Texas and across the country, it's your turn to say it -- add your name today.

This isn't just a symbolic show of support.

This is about keeping the spotlight on what these legislators are trying to do in Texas, and starting to shine that light on some of the equally disturbing attacks on women that are making their way through state legislatures across the country.

Because of one powerful woman's voice -- and the thousands of people who had her back -- it didn't go Governor Perry's way on Tuesday night. He called it a "breakdown of decorum and decency" -- and what he's describing was the women of Texas, who literally had to scream to be heard to defend their rights from being stripped away by extremists.

OFA's fearless Texas State Coordinator Lauren Coffee has been on the ground with our organizers, working with our allies, and making damn sure that this fight isn't over.

Governor Perry and these extreme Texas legislators might eventually force their bill through. But even they know that what happened on Tuesday was just the start.

Across the country, hundreds of thousands of people tuned in to witness the ugly efforts to strip women's rights away.

No matter where these extreme measures pop up, OFA is going to be there, fighting for women.

Stand with the women of Texas right now -- and join this fight today:

http://my.barackobama.com/Stand-Up-For-Women

Thanks -- more soon,

Lindsay

BREAKING: National Political Analyst Larry Sabato Downgrades Our Chances of Winning. Give today to defeat Hayworth and stop Boehner's agenda.

Hey John,

Campaign season just kicked off, and a SECOND national report just confirmed that our race is tighter than ever.

If we lose this, Congresswoman Hayworth will be another vote for Boehner's agenda: a vote against the middle class, women, equality, and the things you and I are fighting for. Can you imagine waking up to that on November 5th?

We beat them in 2012, John, but getting our message to voters - online, on air and on the doors - costs money. Can you take a minute and click here to donate $250 before midnight tomorrow so we can win?

Thanks - together, we can win this.

Sean

P.S. - You can also call Maura at (845) 565-1842 if that's your style. She'll tell you how we're going to spend every cent to defeat Boehner's agenda.

John,

Greetings from VT. Hillary visited here in 1992. You might ask her about her horse back ride and her trip to the local dump with the pistol packing woman dump operator.

I find the rise of Trump and Sanders to be fascinating. Bob Reich's recent column on this is also pretty interesting. As a long time friend of HRC, nearly 50 years now, I am getting very curious as to how she views this possible deep change to the fundamentals of politics in the US.

WHY is she running for president? Why is more important the the What or the How. Currently I am seeing a lot of policy What and How, but not enough Why.

If Reich is right, then the more she spends on advertising, $2M in NH and Iowa? the more she demonstrates that she may not be the solution. Ironic. How does she escape the dilemma of being strongly associated with the forces that got us into trouble, NAFTA and the repeal of Glass Siegel come to mind, and the general idea that only fresh perspectives can get us out of trouble? That is, the more her campaign resembles a first rate old style corporate ad, the more she looks as if she is stuck in the past. Currently, her beautifully done ads have a very strong corporate flavor. Once this would have been a good thing. But today?

Her non positions on TPP, Keystone XL, restoring Glass Siegel, and the minimum wage issues all look like more of the same old same old that got us into trouble. She has not yet come out strongly on these issues. A $12 minimum wage? Why is that a stronger solution to inequity than $15?

In any case, perhaps you have seen this op-ed I co-authored and that was published in the Pittsburg Post Gazette.

See: http://www.post-gazette.com/opinion/Op-Ed/2015/05/31/Save-the-planet-while-lifting-fellow-humans-out-of-poverty-with-regenerative-capitalism/stories/201505310082

Does Hillary have a position on Regenerative Capitalism, even if by any other name? Has she seen the op-ed? BTW, I got a thank you from the Sanders campaign for sharing the op-ed.

I hope to hear from you.

Best regards,

Jock

I know you're swamped but thought this was worth passing along. Len Sistek (former Deputy Assistant Sec Def at the end of the Clinton Administration) who worked for Rep. Lane Evans on the Hill at the House VA Committee is currently running Congressional Affairs at the VA Department. He can be enormously helpful from the inside for whomever is handling the transition so I wanted to pass along.

torn. if we don't say anything, it will be noticed by labor and they WILL ask her at some point. We can burn a chip on it now and apologize that we tried to get it in her talking points. however, I do worry about commenting on some other policy and not on this one.

Clarifying… I've stayed out of this so far, but if you use the hashtag, it feels like you are expressing support for $15 to me.

It's too long. We could tweak if needed, but we were worried given the notes that we might not end up supporting $15 for fast food workers that we didn't want a full-throated/hash-tagged support.

- Hillary believes every American deserves a chance at success and shouldn't have to march in the streets to earn a true living wage. You shouldn't have to be a CEO to get a raise. Everyday Americans should be able to make a little more so you can worry a little less. A higher minimum wage doesn't just help those at the bottom of the pay scale, it has a ripple effect across the economy and helps millions of American workers and middle class families.

Does she support a nationwide $15 minimum wage?

- She supports raising the minimum wage, and believes we need to have a conversation with workers, experts and economists about the target and the timeline.

So she won't endorse the Fight for 15?

- She is still working through the details of her own plan, which will reflect her belief that every American deserves a chance at success through a true living wage.

Sorry to be drumming on this one, but I'm not comfortable with this tweet b/c I worry that it will be linked to minimum wage increase. So don't want to say "stand with" Can we go back to this (it is 2 characters over):

Every American deserves a fair shot at success. Fast food & child care workers shouldn't have to march in streets for living wages # Fightfor 15

Draft Tweet:

Every American deserves a fair shot at success with a true living wage. I stand with fast food workers in the #fightfor15. —H

Points for press and talkers:

Does she support the Fight for 15:

- Hillary believes every American deserves a chance at success with a true living wage, so she supports the fast food workers and others who are out there asking for a living wage and a fair shot at success. You shouldn't have to be a CEO to get a raise. Everyday Americans should be able to make a little more so you can worry a little less. A higher minimum wage doesn't just help those at the bottom of the pay scale, it has a ripple effect across the economy and helps millions of American workers and middle class families.

Does she support a nationwide $15 minimum wage?

- She supports raising the minimum wage, and believes we need to have a conversation with workers, experts and economists about the target and the timeline.

I think Brandon has discussed with Robby, but we are really hoping the Secretary will react, through social media or however you see fit, to the incredible day of action that just kicked off to spotlight the crisis of underpaid work in the economy. We expect strikes in 236 cities in the US, as well as strikes and support actions in 123 cities outside United States in 35 countries on six continents.

I don't have Jen's contact info or I'd send her way too. Below you'll see the core messages we are using.

Best,

Peter

- On 4/15, workers across industries, students, faith leaders and community supporters are joining together for the biggest-ever mobilization of low-wage workers in U.S. history.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

- America can't build a strong future with falling wages.

- When large, profitable corporations like McDonald's hold down wages and benefits, it hurts all of us.

- Ordinary people who work hard are being paid so little that they can't afford the basics—like groceries, rent, or transportation — and that reduces purchasing power in our neighborhoods.

- Boosting pay will put money into the hands of working moms and dads, so they can put more money back into our community and create more good jobs.

- By sticking together, people in the Fight for $15 movement are making change happen and are being heard.

- They are coming together across industries-- including fast-food workers, home care workers, child care workers, airport workers, adjunct professors and Walmart workers--and from every corner of the country.

- And they are being joined by students, faith leaders and other supporters, who know that paying workers $15 will lift up the entire country.

On 4/15, America is standing up for jobs that give our friends, our neighbors, and our families a fair shot at a secure future.

Just a quick note about tomorrow's meeting.

We're scheduled to go from 4-830 although I know some of you may need to leave a little early.

I would propose going through the materials in the following order with the following time allocations (I will try to be pretty strict about enforcing these). I don't want to suggest that some matters are more important than others, but also think that realistically we need to devote time to those subjects that will benefit the most from group input and where I suspect the transition leadership will be most focused on our work:

- Budget (75 minutes)
- Stimulus (75 minutes)
- Financial (75 minutes)
- International (20 minutes)
- Misc (Jon will just cover the pieces that fit with the financial crisis) (20 minutes)

In addition, Karen has been working on some materials about how the actual transition would work, which I don't think she'll be ready to present in detail, but could I'm sure benefit from your thoughts.

Jon has arranged for people to show PP slides, but it would be helpful if you could bring hard copies for everyone as well.

Finally, John Podesta may join us for part or all of the session.

Thanks.

New Report Details Strategies to Boost Access to, Performance on Advanced Placement Exams for African-American Students in Urban School Districts

FOR IMMEDIATE RELEASE

LOS ANGELES - The successful strategies used by six urban school systems across the country to boost African-American student participation in and performance on Advanced Placement tests are detailed in a new report released today by The Eli and Edythe Broad Foundation .

The report, "The Road to Equity: Expanding AP Access and Success for African-American Students," details how the following school systems are increasing college readiness of African-American students by improving their AP passing rates quickly enough to gain on their white peers while increasing or keeping participation rates steady:

- Cobb County School District, Ga.
- Fulton County School System, Ga.
- Garland Independent School District, Texas
- Jefferson County Public Schools, Ky.
- Orange County Public Schools, Fla.
- San Diego Unified School District

In looking to identify urban school districts with promising trends in student achievement and college-readiness, The Broad Foundation analyzed four years of AP exam participation and passing rates for students in the 75 districts whose demographics qualify them for consideration for the annual Broad Prize for Urban Education .

The foundation found that the districts were able to simultaneously raise performance on AP tests without losing ground on participation by employing many of the following practices and strategies:

1. Offer a rigorous curriculum beginning in elementary grades
2. Expand access to gifted programs
3. Analyze student results on precursors to college entrance exams--like PSAT and EXPLORE--to identify potential AP students and actively recruit them to enroll in AP courses
4. Provide extra academic and social support to students
5. Dramatically increase the number of AP course offerings
6. Offer additional teacher training and professional development

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

7. Instill confidence in students about their college-going potential
8. Educate parents about the benefits of AP

The College Board's Advanced Placement program is a benchmark for academic rigor and offers high school students the opportunity to earn college credit, thus saving students time and money. Enrollment in AP courses has tripled since 2000 as districts moved to increase course offerings and broaden student recruits in the challenging courses.

"AP is an important predictor of college success when teachers and students use AP's standards as an inspiration, developing through practice the most important academic skills needed in college," said Trevor Packer, the College Board's senior vice president for AP and instruction. "Data identify thousands of minority and low-income students who have the academic potential to succeed in Advanced Placement courses, but lack access or encouragement to pursue such opportunities. We celebrate the AP teachers and students of these six urban districts for their extraordinary accomplishments. Their successes show that with the right support systems and best practices, broader access to AP can provide a diversity of students with a stronger foundation for college and career success."

The report found that in nearly all of the 75 Broad Prize-eligible school districts , the gap in both AP passing rates and participation rates between African-American students and their white counterparts is significant.

"This report underscores the need for districts to actively work to increase access to and success on AP tests," said Rebecca Wolf DiBiase, managing director of programs for The Broad Foundation. "We are highlighting the practices in these six districts to demonstrate that improvement is possible. But progress needs to happen much faster and in all schools before we can truly ensure that all students have access to and the necessary preparation for success in college."

The Education Trust also released the findings today of new research that low-income and students of color do not have equal access to AP and International Baccalaureate programs. The report, "Finding America's Missing AP and IB Students ," reveals that most national participation gaps could be eliminated if every school with an AP program focused on encouraging and enrolling its low-income and students of color in the college preparatory courses.

The $1 million Broad Prize, established in 2002, is the largest education award in the country given to school districts. The Broad Prize is awarded each year to honor urban school districts that demonstrate the greatest overall performance and improvement in student achievement while reducing achievement gaps among students from low-income families and students of color.

Founded by entrepreneur Eli Broad and his wife Edythe, both graduates of Detroit Public Schools, The Eli and Edythe Broad Foundation is a philanthropy that seeks to ensure that every student in an urban public school has the opportunity to succeed. Bringing together top education experts and practitioners, the foundation funds system-wide programs and policies that strengthen public schools by creating environments that allow good teachers to do great work and enable students of all backgrounds to learn and thrive. For more information, visit www.broadeducation.org , and updates are available on Facebook and Twitter @broadfoundation . For more information about The Broad Prize, visit www.broadprize.org .

What You Need to Know Today in Politics

One Day Until Super Tuesday, When Some Clarity (Maybe) Moves In

By MAGGIE HABERMAN

Good Monday morning.

A raucous Republican race could gain clarity this week, and Senator Bernie Sanders of Vermont could face a dwindling opportunity to prove he can develop support beyond his coalition of younger, whiter voters, as the parallel primaries head into Super Tuesday.

With roughly a dozen nominating contests in both primaries, the Republican votes present an opportunity for Donald J. Trump to amass a plurality of the 595 delegates available, and to put that much more distance between him and Senators Ted Cruz of Texas and Marco Rubio of Florida. Mr. Cruz is fighting to win his home state of Texas, which votes on Tuesday, while Mr. Rubio is looking to increase his vote totals in congressional districts and to bolster his delegate count.

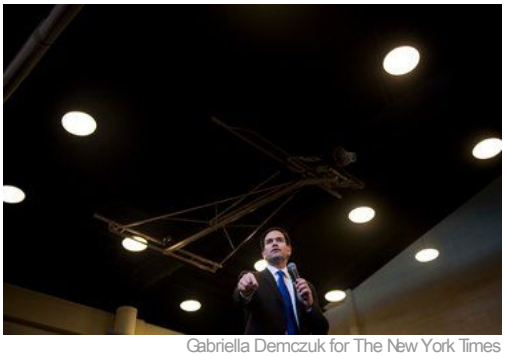
But it also appears that those in the Republican Party who do not back Mr. Trump are realizing that he could be their problem through the fall. And in the last two days,

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Mr. Trump has given his opponents a lot of ammunition — by initially refusing to disavow support from the former Ku Klux Klan leader David Duke, who has praised Mr. Trump's ascent in the primaries, and by retweeting a famous quote from Mussolini.

Mr. Trump has proved Teflon-like in the campaign so far. But he is now facing the first sustained attacks in the form of television advertisements, and he is doing little to counter them with his own spending. And Mr. Rubio and Mr. Cruz are unloading their opposition research files, including mentions that Mr. Trump avoided the military draft as a younger man and that some news accounts have claimed his businesses had reported ties to organized crime. But the biggest charge that Mr. Rubio hopes will stick is the one in which he has called Mr. Trump a "con man" over and over. With lesser schoolyard taunts, like discussing the size of Mr. Trump's fingers, he is trying to get in the real estate billionaire's head.

As for the Democrats, Mr. Sanders is looking to rebound after a deeply lopsided loss to Hillary Clinton in the South Carolina primary, where more than half the voters were African-American. Mrs. Clinton overwhelmingly won black voters. And while it is hard to translate the results from one state to others, Mr. Sanders had a number of paid staff members in South Carolina and worked hard — raising questions about where he will next find success.



What We're Watching Today

- On the day before 11 states participate in Super Tuesday, where are the candidates choosing to make their final appeals? On the Democratic side, both Mrs. Clinton and Mr. Sanders will be in Massachusetts, where 116 delegates are at stake and where polls show Mrs. Clinton with a slight edge. Mr. Sanders will also be in Minnesota, 93 delegates, and Mrs. Clinton will be in Virginia, 110.
- Mr. Rubio will appear in several of the states, including Georgia, 76 delegates; Tennessee, 58; Arkansas, 40; and Oklahoma, 43. Mr. Trump and Ben Carson will be in Virginia, 49. Gov. John R. Kasich of Ohio will be in Massachusetts, 42 delegates, and Vermont, 16. Mr. Cruz will be in Minnesota, 38, and Texas, his home state and, with its 155 Republican delegates, the contest on which he is staking his strategy.

Subject: 2013 K1 Tax Estimates

Hi John,

Hope all is going well in your new position. Doesn't appear like there is a lot of down time with all that is going on in the White House!

See below for your 2013 Equilibrium Capital Group, LLC tax estimate for you to use if you prefer to file by April 15, 2014. While we anticipate the final number being slightly different, the difference should not be material. Please let me know if you have any questions.

Sincerely,

Marie

Press Call Tomorrow: Responding to the Tragedy in Haiti

Washington D.C. - Tomorrow at 9:30 AM, Mark Schneider, Senior Vice President and Special Adviser on Latin America at the International Crisis Group and former Director of the Peace Corps, Amb. James Dobbins, who served as a special envoy to Haiti, and NSN Senior Adviser Gen. Paul Eaton, will discuss the American response to the tragedy in Haiti. They will examine the civilian, humanitarian and military components being utilized to help rescue and recover individuals, rebuild infrastructure and the long term goals of stabilizing and strengthening Haiti's economic and political situation.

Call-in #: 1-800-894-5910**
International Only*: 785-424-1052
Passcode: 7HAITI**

WHO: Mark Schneider, Senior Vice President and Special Adviser on Latin America at the International Crisis Group, former Director of the Peace Corps
Amb. James Dobbins, who served as a Special Envoy to Haiti;
NSN Senior Adviser Maj. General Paul Eaton

WHAT: Press Call on America's response to the tragedy in Haiti

WHEN: Friday, January 22
9:30 AM

Mark Schneider served as the Director of the Peace Corps from 1999-2001. As the Assistant Administrator of the U.S. Agency for International Development 1993-1999 for Latin America and the Caribbean, he oversaw the post conflict reconstruction programs in Central America and coordinated the response to Hurricane Mitch. He led U.S. delegations to donor conferences for El Salvador, Guatemala, Central America, Andean countries and Haiti, led or participated in election monitoring in El Salvador, Guatemala, Haiti, Nicaragua and Bolivia and headed U.S. delegations to OAS, IDB and ECLAC conferences.

From 1981 to 1993, he was Chief of the Office of Analysis and Strategic Planning at the Pan American Health Organization/ World Health Organization. He was the Principal Deputy Assistant Secretary of State for Human Rights and Humanitarian Affairs from 1977-1979 and a foreign policy advisor to Senator Edward M. Kennedy 1970-76.0.

Amb. James F. Dobbins has held various State Department and White House posts, including assistant secretary of state for Europe, special assistant to the president for the Western Hemisphere, special adviser to the president and secretary of state for the Balkans, and ambassador to the European Community. He was the Clinton administration s special envoy for Somalia, Haiti, Bosnia, and Kosovo and the Bush administration s first special envoy for Afghanistan. Lead author of The RAND History of Nation-Building and The Beginner s Guide to Nation-Building, Ambassador Dobbins lives in Washington, D.C., where he currently directs RAND s International Security and Defense Policy Center.

Major General Paul D. Eaton (Ret.) retired from the US Army after more than 33 years service. His assignments include Infantry command from the company to brigade levels, command of the Infantry Center at Fort Benning and Chief of Infantry. His most recent operational assignment was Commanding General of the command charged with reestablishing Iraqi Security Forces 2003-2004, where he built the command and established the structure and infrastructure for the Iraqi Armed Forces.

Other operational assignments include Somalia, Bosnia and Albania. Additional assignments include the Joint Staff, Deputy Commanding General for Transformation and Stryker Unit Development and Assistant Professor and head of the French Department at West Point. He is a 1972 graduate of West Point, son of a West Point Air Force fighter pilot, long an MIA from the Vietnam War; remains recently identified for burial at Arlington National Cemetery. He is married to PJ Eaton, an Army veteran and daughter of a Naval Academy graduate career Marine. He is father to a daughter and two sons, both Soldiers, one a Military Intelligence Specialist,

After a discussion with John (who is calling to discuss w Bruce), we think the following is best:

1. Hold exec call today as scheduled
2. Schedule a Pre-Year End Meeting call on wednesday to tee up items for an agenda for an at length discussion on Friday.
3. Schedule a Pre-Year End Meeting in NY on Friday. Those who can join in person that would be great. Those that can't, can join by phone. An agenda and any related documents will be forwarded to you on Thursday. 4. Cancel the meeting that was tentative w BC for Friday as BC has expressed concern (to both John and I) that he thinks we need more time to prepare for the year end discussion with him 5. The Year End Meeting (formally the budget meeting) will cover both financial, strategic and policy issues so please ensure that your input, preparation and any documents in advance for the pre-meetings and the meeting include these issues.
6. We will reschedule the year end meeting w BC to a later date subject to his availability so please stand by for that date.
7. Michelle and Ana will follow-up on times for wednesday call and friday meeting as outlined above with this group.
8. Manifests, format and agenda for the year end meeting w BC will be developed and approved by Bruce and John. If you have items for wednesday's call please send them to John w a copy to Ana so an agenda can be developed.

9. Ana and Michelle will serve as the all-in coordination point: schedule of pre-calls+meetings; collection, organization and distribution of documents to be used; assistance with drafting the agendas as needed by Bruce and John.

Please let us know if you have any questions. Thanks lg

I think this blog overstates what Warren was doing, but we need to craft the economic message for Hillary so that Warren's common inaccurate conclusions are addressed. Xoxo Lynn http://blogs.wsj.com/washwire/2015/01/07/warren-throws-four-punchs-at-the-clintons/

Sen. Elizabeth Warren professes that she is not running for president, but her Wednesday speech to a major labor conference is loaded with not-terribly-veiled references to Hillary Clinton and attacks on Bill Clinton's record as president.

The Massachusetts Democrat's prepared remarks to the AFL-CIO's National Summit on Wages in Washington are a lesson in progressive economic theory. In this retelling, landmark free trade deals and banking deregulation boost the fortunes of the wealthy at the expense of the poor and middle class.

Criticism of the Clintons is threaded throughout Ms. Warren's remarks. Most comes in the form of a liberal critique of Mr. Clinton's economic record, but there is one significant shot at Mrs. Clinton as well.

Of course, Ms. Warren has insisted she isn't running for president but has couched it in the present tense, most recently last month when she refused to rule out a run during an interview with NPR.

Washington Wire found at least four instances in Ms. Warren's Wednesday speech in which she takes political shots at the Clintons.

The Wal-Mart WMT +1.48% dog-whistle: "Corporate profits and GDP are up. But if you work at Wal-Mart, and you are paid so little that you still need food stamps to put groceries on the table, what does more money in stockholders' pockets and an uptick in GDPdo for you?"

Wal-Mart is a regular bogeyman for Big Labor, but it is also a particularly tough attack for Mrs. Clinton to echo, since she served on the retailer's board of directors for six years when her husband was the Arkansas governor. The tie was regularly brought up by supporters of Mrs.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Clinton's opponents during the 2008 presidential primary campaign and remains well remembered in Iowa, where several Democrats raised it unprompted during interviews last week.

"Even though they don't exist anymore, her connections to Wal-Mart, those don't sit well," said Jennifer Herrington, the Democratic Party chairwoman in Page County. "People still talk about it. The sense is that not much has really changed."

Bill Clinton was just as bad as the Republicans: "Pretty much the whole Republican Party – and, if we're going to be honest, too many Democrats – talked about the evils of 'big government' and called for deregulation. It sounded good, but it was really about tying the hands of regulators and turning loose big banks and giant international corporations to do whatever they wanted to do."

Part of the Hillary Clinton argument is that her husband's presidency presided over the economic growth of the 1990s. But here Ms. Warren takes direct aim at Mr. Clinton's record on deregulation and harkens back to his 1996 State of the Union address and its signature line , "The era of big government is over."

NAFTA was a bad deal: "Look at the choices Washington has made, the choices that have left America's middle class in a deep hole… The choice to sign trade pacts and tax deals that let subsidized manufacturers around the globe sell here in America while good American jobs get shipped overseas."

Labor has long been sour on free-trade agreements, and Mr. Obama during the 2008 campaign said he would renegotiate it, though that never happened. Mrs. Clinton at the time also said she would seek a better NAFTA deal with Canada and Mexico , but it becomes politically difficult for her to offer substantive critiques of her husband's White House record.

Mr. Clinton wasn't good for the middle class: "So who got the increase in income over the last 32 years? One hundred percent of it went to the top 1%. All of the new money earned in this economy over the past generation — all that growth in the GDP — went to the top. All of it."

Here Ms. Warren makes a potent argument that Mr. Clinton – and by association, Mrs. Clinton – had the same results for the middle class as Republican presidents. By tying the records of the Reagan, Clinton, Obama and two Bush administrations together, Ms. Warren paints herself as the outside-the-system crusader her supporters want her to be.

Hello gentlemen,

Thank you both for coming to lunch with Ed last week. Delighted you got to meet him in person. Will email Jim separately to thank him as well.

Herb, thanks especially for being so engaged in the conversation. Glad you were able to ask Ed some tough questions. I hope you agree that his answers were very compelling. And thanks again for dinner. I had a great time, as always.

Anthony

Subject: Don't Miss Article on Rudy

I have been deep in the Republican research all weekend. If you only read one article about Rudy Guiliani, it should be this September 2007 Vanity Fair piece. It reads like an airport novel, and includes some telling little details like the fact that Guiliani's second wife found out he was leaving her when he held a press conference. In the unlikely chance Rudy is the nominee, I think we need an ad and surrogate group about that. A large number of Americans are divorced and it will drive women nuts that Rudy's wife got the news about her divorce -- from the news.

Vanity Fair: Giuliani's Princess Bride

Judith Giuliani always dreamed big, which got her out of small-town Pennsylvania, through two marriages, and into the arms of Rudy Giuliani. But, as her husband runs for president, people are asking, "Who does she think she is?"

by Judy Bachrach September 2007

It was the first anniversary of 9/11 at Ground Zero, an occasion when the names of the dead were read aloud. The first reader was to be Rudy Giuliani, New York's mayor at the time of the disaster, whose actions during those terrible days would prove a political boon. An army of policemen flanked him—an excessive number, spectators thought, since, due to the hundreds of dignitaries gathered, security outside was extremely tight.

Inside the tent were Secretary of State Colin Powell, New York governor George Pataki, Richard Grasso, who was then head of the New York Stock Exchange, and New York mayor Michael Bloomberg. Senator Hillary Clinton stood in the aisle—until she was unceremoniously pushed by a phalanx of four burly cops entering the tent, these guarding Judith Nathan, Giuliani's girlfriend. No apologies were offered, one observer noted.

"The nerve of that woman!" Hillary exploded, recalling that her own daughter's Secret Service detail evaporated soon after Bill Clinton left office. Why should an ex-mayor's girlfriend get such royal treatment? "Who does she think she is?" Hillary said to an observer, who later recounted the story.

An interesting question. Who does Judith Stish Ross Nathan Giuliani think she is? These days, even with her husband, a freshly minted multi-millionaire, far ahead of the competition in the Republican presidential polls, no one, least of all Judith, 52, seems to have a clue. In a way, this is understandable. There have been so many different Judiths. As her second husband, Bruce Nathan, has told friends, "She is in an ever changing mode upward."

Three decades ago, Judi Ann Stish, as she was known in Hazleton, Pennsylvania, left her parents' home, a gray two-story house fronted by potted geraniums and a ribbon of flagstone. Fifteen years ago, while working for $1,200 a month as a part-time receptionist, she was living on borrowed money and the hospitality of friends—and threatening her estranged second husband with prosecution over a $3,500 rug. "Judi started from scratch, so of course she grabs every opportunity that comes into her life," Manos Zacharioudakis, her onetime live-in companion, tells me. "Of course she was attracted to Giuliani."

Today she and Giuliani, when they are not boarding private Gulfstream IV jets to Europe or trying to woo voters, shuttle between a $4 million Hamptons house and a $5 million nine-room Upper East Side apartment near Madison Avenue, its dining room walnut-paneled and crammed with crystal, china, and linen from Scully & Scully. Her annual salary has also improved: $125,000, evidently for helping to write some of the speeches Giuliani likes to give (for which he received $11.7 million between January 2006 and March 2007). This comes as a surprise to at least one of Judith's acquaintances. Asked if he knew Judith was writing speeches, one former Giuliani aide replied, "Holy cow! God forbid!"

The details of Judith's life have also undergone some refurbishing. Her monogrammed hand-stitched napkins embraced by thick silver napkin rings are on display, along with the new cigar room designed for her husband, and a mantelpiece adorned with white porcelain figurines of Winston Churchill, the statesman with whom Giuliani likes to invite comparison. She struck an odalisque pose in Hamptonstyle magazine, and appeared robed in a floor-length burgundy gown by Carolina Herrera on the cover of Avenue magazine, whose editorial director, Pamela Gross, accompanies her frequently, especially when TV cameras are present. ("Never get between Pamela, Judith, and a camera," advises one observer.) Judith sits in the front rows of fashion shows, her hair freshly styled by a full-time assistant lured from Frédéric Fekkai, and, when asked to pose, thrusts out an obliging hip for the cameras. Although she informed WWD, "I have no room for shopping in my life," she buys Dolce & Gabbana.

A dramatic transformation has occurred, one she does not care to discuss, despite repeated requests by Vanity Fair. She had always been known as "Judi." "Judi is what she was born. I don't think we called her Judith ever," says her father, Donald Stish, 78, seated on his porch one sultry June day in the shade of a gray metal awning. He is a calm, thick-set man who marvels at his daughter's makeover. After her second divorce, she upgraded herself to "Judith" with such vehemence that, one former Giuliani aide confides, "at City Hall we were prohibited from calling her Judi. She would bawl us out if we did."

For years she appeared, in the public record, to have had only one failed marriage, but as it turned out she'd had two. It seemed that she had gone to Pennsylvania State nursing school, as The New York Times once reported, but she had not. She completed two years of nursing school, but left hospital work before a year was up. Nonetheless, Giuliani has publicly referred to her "expertise" in "biological and chemical" disasters, and believes she would be a help in the event of an anthrax attack.

Her second husband, Bruce Nathan, was, Barbara Walters mentioned in a March interview with Judith, a man of "means"—a notion Judith promoted. A former boyfriend tells me that after the divorce Judith often referred to her ex-husband as a "millionaire." But in 1991, the year before their separation, Nathan earned exactly $72,775. Judith would later insist that Nathan had a trust fund worth perhaps $1 million and a yacht. However, as Bruce has informed friends, there was only a boat—and no trust fund at all. "Do you honestly think I'd be selling wallpaper if I had all that money?" he would ask.

Inside the marriage, according to friends, Bruce considered himself a "golden retriever, who put a lot of faith and trust in things," only to find that trust misplaced. "Some people can fool you," he would declare sorrowfully. There were expenses incurred by Judi—large sums, considering his modest salary, he complained, mostly for her clothes or tuition for their adopted daughter, Whitney, at elite schools. Toward the end of their marriage, when Bruce's credit cards were no longer at her disposal, Judi was incensed.

The family was then living in a small rented house in the pricey neighborhood of Pacific Palisades, California. Although Judith also claimed on ABC that she had to "re-enter the workforce, after, oh gosh, more than a decade of being a wife and mother" following her divorce, she had actually resumed working in surgical sales months before leaving Nathan.

And finally, Judith told Walters, she would not reveal the circumstances of how she first met Giuliani, in 1999, except to say that the encounter, fraught with mutual attraction, was "by accident." In reality, it was she who approached Giuliani, who was then married and a father, with words of admiration and a proffered business card.

Within Giuliani's camp the picture of who Judith is is not much clearer. "When I see her, she's only interested in my jewelry, where I buy my dresses," says a friend of the former mayor's. "Does anyone really know Judith Giuliani? Let's be honest: no one does."

The Giuliani people certainly wish to keep it that way. "I'm hearing bad reports about you. Bad reports. You interviewed Mrs. Giuliani's father, in Hazleton!" Mike McKeon, the campaign spokesman, barks at me within four hours of the encounter.

"We're not allowed to talk to the press," Judith's mother, Joan, says nervously when she discovers me interviewing her husband. She is a short, brisk woman in black trousers—she shares with Judith a small, purposeful mouth—who expresses despair over her husband's candor and wants me to shred my notes on the carpeted porch.

Bits of the real Judith are scattered all over the country: in the South, East, and West. They must be carefully pieced together.

When Judi met Rudy, he was mayor of New York and married to the actress Donna Hanover, who is the mother of his children, Andrew, now 21, and Caroline, 18. At the time, the family was living in Gracie Mansion. In retrospect, it is odd it took Hanover so long to catch on. By then she had endured at least one very public embarrassment as a result of her husband's roving eye. In the late 90s, Cristyne Lategano, the mayor's press secretary, had been widely assumed, despite Lategano's heated denials, to hold a special place in his heart. By March 1999, however, Hanover was breathing easier, even as Lategano grew anxious. According to knowledgeable sources, Lategano was well aware there was a change in her friend the mayor, a sudden mysterious chill.

It was around this time that Judi Nathan met Giuliani at Club Macanudo, an East Side cigar bar he was known to frequent. The details of that fateful night have since been industriously hidden and altered. They met at a private-school function, went one version of the story; at Coopers Classic Cars and Cigars, the former bar of Elliot Cuker, Rudy's onetime confidant, went another.

Around a year ago, Cuker has told friends, he was pressed to back up a version worthy of a potential president and First Lady. Specifically, Cuker has confided, he was told to say it was he who formally introduced the couple at his restaurant. He pointedly refused. "It pissed Elliot off that he was asked to lie for them," says a friend, who adds that Giuliani and Cuker are no longer close.

At the time of that first meeting, Judi and her daughter were living in a one-bedroom apartment off Third Avenue with Zacharioudakis, a handsome Greek psychologist nine years her junior. "Whitney slept in the bedroom, Judi and I in the pullout bed in the living room," Zacharioudakis tells me, adding that he didn't mind the cramped quarters. He found Judi to be "a beautiful, sensual, erotic creature." She was no pushover, he adds. "She will fight teeth and claws in order for her dignity not to be abused."

Still, after four years, he says, "you get bored, the passion is not the same." Moreover, "she wanted to get married." He did not.

With that revelation, their relationship fell apart, inducing in Judi some bitterness, he recalls, "because she had invested some years in this." When he came home at night, she would leave. It was on one of these forays that she met Giuliani—not that Zacharioudakis knew this at the time. In retrospect, however, he understands her fascination. "Giuliani was the No. 1 man in New York!" he says.

And Judi was thrilled with her new boyfriend. "This is the guy," she informed her mother after their third meeting. Rudy and she, she later told the press, were simply "two people in love—never mind the extracurricular stuff that went on around us." That "extracurricular stuff," however, included not just Rudy's wife and kids but the entire city of New York.

Giuliani invited Judith everywhere: to Yankees games in the summer of '99, to Cuker's restaurant, to the millennium celebration in Times Square, and to Town Hall meetings. This lack of restraint was not unusual for him: "Rudy has no willpower when it comes to relationships. This is why it's such an issue," says a Giuliani friend.

By 1999 he had acquired only the thinnest veneer of discretion—even though at the time he was seriously planning a Senate run against Hillary Clinton. "I was told Judith was Kate Anson's best friend and that's why she was going to all these big events.… Everyone was told that," reports one top aide from that era. Anson was and still is Giuliani's loyal scheduler.

The mayor began to spend his weekends—accompanied, as the New York Post reported, by a detail of detectives, which may have cost taxpayers $3,000 a tryst—in Southampton, where Judith owned a condominium. Since he had until then always accounted for his weekends, says the incisive Giuliani biographer Wayne Barrett, "his press office started telling reporters, 'He's teaching Andrew how to play golf.' Now, Andrew's old enough to understand—he has to be aware that his father used him as a beard!"

At the annual Saint Patrick's Day Parade, in 2000, Judith marched right behind the mayor. She was by his side when he went to the hospital for prostate tests a month later and then learned he had cancer. When he decided to leave Hanover, in May, he made a public announcement—"Judith Nathan is a very, very fine person" were his words, "and I'm going to need her more now than maybe I did before." That was how his wife of 16 years discovered her marriage was over.

Donna consulted a divorce lawyer, the Daily News revealed later that month, and learned she could potentially bar Judith from Gracie Mansion as "poisonous to the home environment." Giuliani canceled his Senate run.

From then on, the couple seemed to grow even closer. "The cancer really got to Rudy because of his own feelings about mortality. He is very, very afraid of death," says a friend. "As his career went downhill, he was being publicly flogged about Donna. Judi was totally loyal. She reflected the essence of what he considered important. Loyalty." Giuliani's divorce lawyer, Raoul Felder, tells me that Judi and Rudy "used to go early in the morning for treatment" to Mount Sinai Hospital. One evening there was a public stroll with Judith for the benefit of the media.

An aide from that time recalls that Judith wasn't disliked—at first—nor did she come as a surprise. "We had been through this all before. When they first come around, they're nice. Until they realize the power they have over him."

Who was this new girlfriend, worried staffers wondered. Their suspicions aroused, they began checking into her background.

Hazleton, Pennsylvania, population 25,000, is a friendly but desolate town ringed by a scarred landscape that in Judi's high-school years was best known for its coal mines. When Judi Stish was born, in 1954, the second of three children, her father was a circulation manager for The Philadelphia Inquirer. "Quite honestly the Stishes were just very nice, simple people," says an old friend. "They ate dinner every night at five p.m. Salad was not something they knew much about. Hoagies and potatoes and corn they knew about."

Their only son, Donald, born with his umbilical cord around his neck, was always frail, according to two family friends. Three years ago, the father says with simple gravity, "while Donnie was praying, he just fell over slowly and passed away. It was like someone was holding him up until he dropped." Judith, the second child, was the family star, as far as her parents were concerned. "They were just enamored with this daughter of theirs who left," says an old friend.

"If you had told me back when we were in high school that one day Judi would move to New York and marry a presidential candidate, I wouldn't have been in the least surprised," says Gemma Matteo, a former classmate of Judi's, now a special-education teacher in Hazleton. In an era of blue jeans and rebellion, Judi was a fresh-faced, meticulously groomed enigma—quiet, self-possessed, biding her time. "Very prim and proper, not a hair out of place," according to Holly Ciotola, another former classmate. "She was always in a dark blazer, white collared shirt, and dark skirt."

In 1974 she graduated from St. Luke's School of Nursing, in Bethlehem, Pennsylvania. As a registered nurse, young Judi spent only a few months at Sacred Heart Hospital, in Allentown, Pennsylvania. She would never care for patients after that. She had other plans. At 19 she married Jeffrey Ross, a U.S. Surgical salesman six years her senior.

In short order both Rosses were working in Charlotte, North Carolina, for U.S. Surgical (now part of Tyco Healthcare), which eventually grew into a billion-dollar enterprise marketing surgical staplers. Judi was excellent at her work, and earned $40,000 a year by the late 70s. But problems arose when animal-rights groups began investigating the way the company sold its products—problems recently pointed out by the New York press. U.S. Surgical used dogs in demonstrations to doctors and hospitals as part of its marketing plan.

"Every salesperson at U.S. Surgical was trained for six weeks with dogs at Lincoln Hospital in the Bronx, and that was really brutal," explains a former employee. "They spent days and days with dogs, taking out the spleen or stomach or the lobe of a lung. Then if the dog started moaning or fidgeted, whoever was closest would push more sedative into him from the syringe. It was horrible. Then the dog would be killed with potassium chloride."

After training, the salespeople marketed the staplers to doctors, and, once again, in many cases large dogs were used, as they had organs comparable in size to those possessed by humans. "After the stapling, sometimes they'd put a big clamp above and below the staple lines of the dog, and fill [the area] with lots of fluid," the ex-employee says. "It would fill up like a balloon, and the salesperson would say to the doctor, 'See—it doesn't leak!' That's how they marketed and sold the product." (Some years ago, former C.E.O. Leon Hirsch defended the company's practice of using dogs, claiming that there was no proper substitute.)

WABC radio host Ron Kuby, a lawyer and severe Giuliani critic, marvels at the campaign's sublime lack of preparation for the storm of fury that greeted the dog issue, in April. "Think of all the hacks and politicos who sit down and they say to Judi, 'O.K., we've gone through your background, husbands, etc.,'" he muses. "'Is there any other thing in your background, some crazy little thing, that might catch someone's attention?' It's at that point you should raise your hand and say, 'Oh, you mean when I was killing puppies?'"

But for some reason the campaign entered the ring gloveless. "I wouldn't dignify it with a comment" was Giuliani's reply when asked about the use of dogs.

Bruce Nathan, dark, handsome, and 28, was earning a modest salary in 1979 selling wallpaper in the South when he met Judi Ross, by then separated from her first husband. Five days after the Rosses were divorced, Bruce and Judi wed, and she moved into his small house, in Charlotte, North Carolina.

Two years later the couple left for Atlanta, where, in 1985, they adopted Whitney. They settled into a more spacious house with a portico of black-and-white marble. Judi joined the Junior League. But it was clear to her intimates that none of this was enough.

"Judi's goal was always to go to New York. Why do you think? Because it's the capital of the world!" says a friend from that era. The Nathans moved to New York in 1987, the year the stock market plunged, and along with it, Bruce's prospects of selling a lot of wallpaper on the East Coast.

It was growing obvious to Judi that, to quote one of Bruce's friends, "his was not a bottomless pit of money." The couple had rented what is described by an old friend as "a teeny-weeny apartment on the Upper East Side."

"They never could afford a big co-op on Park Avenue and she wanted it," says another friend. "I think Bruce wasn't doing well enough for her, and she was ambitious."

Pretty soon these friends heard the same stories that would eventually find their way into court papers: Bruce would claim that his wife called him "'a kike,' when I couldn't afford something; 'a rich little kike,' … 'Jew boy.'" Certainly he felt they had entirely different ambitions. "Unlike my wife, I was not a social climber," he would later observe. "My wife's 'main goal' in life was being involved with whatever was 'the in-thing' at the moment … the 'right church' … the 'right people'; adopting a child for status purposes."

For her part, Judi claimed Bruce had a "violent temper" and was physically abusive: there was, for example, she said, a blow to her uterus and later another to the ear, which required a hospital visit. "Not true," Bruce tells me flatly.

Despite severe misgivings, in the summer of 1991 Judi Nathan, accompanied by seven-year-old Whitney and their cocker spaniel, followed Bruce to California, in the hope that somehow or other the marriage would thereby be improved. The couple furnished their small rented house, in Pacific Palisades, with articles of whimsy—a framed picture of cats in human garb—and antique reproductions. In the cupboards were a few trinkets from Lalique and six Baccarat glasses. About the only item of value was the $3,500 Aubusson rug Judi would later fight for.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

Outwardly, Judi appeared happy enough, says Marilyn Stein, a friend who still lives in the neighborhood. On the other hand, Stein notes, "I always got the feeling that for her the move was temporary."

Certainly Judi was eager to increase the couple's income. Her husband had had to take a 10 percent cut in his $80,000-a-year salary. In the last months of her brief California sojourn, Judi signed on as a saleswoman for DynaMed Surgical, which makes ophthalmologic products. "Very, very savvy, very professional" is Bradley Bakke's estimation of his former employee's work in California. The head of the Minnesota-based firm adds that "when she left I had no idea why. She gave no explanation."

But to her friend Stein, Judi was more voluble. Late one night in mid-March 1992, she and Whitney arrived at her neighbor's door. Bruce had told her he had stopped loving her, Judi said. He had punched her "on the side of my head," she claimed. He had screamed "vile epithets" at her. He had spit. The police were summoned.

The next day she and the child left. Bruce Nathan called and called his wife and daughter, hoping Whitney would be brought back home, in vain. He phoned the police, accusing his wife of child abduction, also in vain. "My kid was just gone," he tells friends these days.

There is no doubt that Judi Nathan faced tough times when she moved back to New York more than a decade ago. She and Whitney initially had to live with friends. Her first job there, as a dental receptionist, was not substantial enough to defray her legal fees, which came to just under $28,000; it was her parents, by then retired in Hazleton, who lent her much of the money, after taking out a second mortgage on their house. Whitney went to the exclusive Spence School, in Manhattan, on a partial scholarship.

Even the $1,600 a month in alimony payments and the resumption of her work as a hospital sales rep, this time for Bristol-Myers Squibb, didn't wholly lighten Judi's load. "She didn't have an easy life bringing up a child in New York as a single mother," says Felder, Giuliani's divorce lawyer, whom she hired when Bruce sued for custody of their daughter, six years ago.

Whitney, whom Judith described to the judge as "this precious little paper doll," was, her mother announced, fighting anorexia, in bad trouble, and associating with the wrong kids. "Failing school, missing classes," Felder added.

Inside the courtroom, Bruce couldn't believe his ears as his former wife offered up every one of Whitney's adolescent issues for inspection. "Her mother publicly came out with this stuff about her own child! You want to screw up a kid? There's a good way!" a family confidant recalls. The teenage Whitney, adds this friend, was "confused, furious, and upset" by her mother's decision to air her problems. There was also fear that the court's judges would be swayed by Giuliani's clout. "We're talking about an extremely powerful man here," Bruce worried aloud.

"My wife drinks often," Bruce had maintained for years. "She is a manipulator and a pathological liar and exaggerator." It was all fuel for the tabloids. Everything in Judi's life was.

"The newspapers talked about her $3,000 pocketbooks and all this stuff. None of this was true," says Felder. "No, she was a very prudent shopper who would go to the store and buy hundred-dollar copies of whatever." The lawyer recalls his client "switching outfits very carefully. She'd wear the dark pearls, not real ones, with the white blouse. She didn't have money."

And when she met Giuliani, Felder adds, he didn't have much money, either, "because Rudy was living on a mayor's salary"—$195,000 a year—"and had no inherited wealth, and was supporting his family very, very well." Giuliani's final settlement with Hanover obliged him to pay her $6.8 million. Prior to that arrangement, her lawyer told the press, she had seriously considered a trial, along with subpoenas to both Judith and Lategano.

The entire divorce battle was played out badly in the press. When Hanover sued to prevent Judith from entering Gracie Mansion, and also refused to move out with her children, Felder announced one bright Mother's Day that New York's resolute First Lady "will have to be dragged from the chain of the chandeliers in Gracie Mansion by the next mayor…. She doesn't care what happens to the children. She cares about getting her name in the paper and embarrassing the mayor and getting more movie roles."

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"Yes, the children were upset," recalls a close confidant of the Giuliani kids, who is not referring simply to the unraveling of their parents' marriage. Far worse "was an application for Dad to allow Mrs. Nathan into Gracie Mansion. That kind of thing was very disconcerting to everyone."

In the midst of all this family strife came 9/11: the deaths, the turmoil, the necessary absences and preoccupations of the Giuliani children's father.

Judith tried valiantly to fill this vacuum: "When Andrew had a football game in New Jersey, say, and Rudy would have to appear on ABC, it would be Judith who'd be the one pushing to make sure the schedule was set up so he could go to Andrew's game, and I know this for a fact," says one former aide who in other respects can be critical of Judith. "Caroline—she wouldn't want her to miss dinner with her father, so Judith made sure his schedule would accommodate that dinner." A pause. "She could be a bitch to everybody else but not to his kids."

There were other efforts at reaching out. Soon after the Twin Towers fell, Judith volunteered at the Family Assistance Center, on Pier 94. When Paul O'Neill of the Yankees came by, Judith got the star right fielder to sign a ball, which she then gave to the teenage Andrew, "as a way of making peace," says Manny Papir, a former Giuliani deputy chief of staff.

None of Judith's efforts, however, proved to be of much consequence—and some, like her recent Christmas gifts of Bibles to the Giuliani kids, have backfired, I am told. According to a number of Giuliani's good friends, the former mayor insists on Judith's presence at events for his offspring—and when this demand is thwarted, he doesn't attend. He was not present, they say, at Andrew's graduation from St. Joseph Regional High School in New Jersey. Now 21 and a Duke University junior, the son tells friends he doesn't speak to Rudy, according to one of his classmates—this at a time when his father is desperate to attract conservative, family-values backing.

Just recently, after explaining to The New York Times that he would not help his father campaign for the presidential nomination, Andrew cited, among other issues, his stepmother, with whom, he said, "there's obviously a little problem."

"Andrew was really siding with his sister, Caroline, here," says a source friendly to Giuliani. "Caroline is silent, but she was very traumatized by the divorce." Two sources who know the family well tell me that Rudy is more attentive to Whitney than he is to his own children. At Caroline's recent graduation, from New York's Trinity School, Rudy and Judith sat in the last row of the balcony and left 10 minutes before the two-hour ceremony ended.

Despite the messy divorces, Judith worked very effectively in the aftermath of 9/11. "For four months she was right in there with [police commissioner] Bernie Kerik, [fire commissioner] Tommy Von Essen, and Richie Sheirer, who headed emergency management," reports one observer, who recalls she sat in on about half the meetings. "We went through the phase where we had to change the operation from rescue to recovery…. You know—you have to come to a decision that, frankly, everyone is dead. There's no one to save."

Judith, this former city employee says, quickly pitched in with "You may want to talk to someone in psychological services about that—how to get the message across to the families." Three mental-health specialists came to the operation command center, at Pier 92, to discuss the best ways of communicating terrible news. Those assembled found Judith's ideas valuable. During those difficult days, she was also extremely solicitous of Giuliani. "It started during his cancer, actually. But after 9/11, even more, she was watching his food, his care, his sleep. She was smack-dab in the middle of it," says a top aide from that era. "You couldn't have asked for anything more. If she was a nuisance at the time, I'd be the first to say it, but it was sincere caring."

No one was surprised when Giuliani presented her, one year later, with a $20,000 Ceylon sapphire-and-diamond ring, selected by the bride-to-be at a store in Atlanta, to which she had flown with one New York City police officer. What did astonish friends was the venue where the couple exchanged vows before 400 guests: the lawn of Gracie Mansion, with Mayor Bloomberg officiating. On May 24, 2003, Andrew Giuliani (as best man), Whitney Nathan (as maid of honor), Vera Wang, Barbara Walters, Henry Kissinger, and Donald Trump all witnessed Judith triumph at Donna's old home. "It was definitely Judith's idea to have it at Gracie," a close confidant tells me. "Rudy—he doesn't give a shit about clothes, bags, suits, or where he gets married."

Judith, on the other hand, clearly put special thought into the occasion. The train of her pale Vera Wang dress was studded with Swarovski crystals; on her dark-red hair perched a Fred Leighton diamond-and-pearl-encrusted tiara.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

"There is a reason why she wore that tiara at her wedding: she really does see herself as a princess," says another former Giuliani aide. "Not as a queen. Queen is her goal. Queen is who she wants to be."

Queenly is certainly what Judith became, her demands and expectations heightened in large part by her husband's new affluence. Giuliani Partners (where she maintains an office) was established five years ago with the help of Giuliani's onetime chief of staff Anthony Carbonetti. It is a firm with management-consulting and security divisions; its clients, as The Washington Post reported, include Purdue Pharma, which hired the firm while being investigated by the D.E.A. and the F.D.A. over deaths stemming from the misuse of its painkiller OxyContin, and the Florida-based Seisint, Inc., which produces a data-mining product. Since Giuliani Partners' inception, the newspaper also reported, it has earned more than $100 million.

This is not the couple's only means of support. At least until recently, Giuliani has been raking in the speaking-engagement fees. Those willing to pay the former mayor $100,000 a speech (and to foot the $36,000 bill for a Gulfstream IV charter) also were contractually obligated to accommodate his wife: "Please note that when arranging your seating, Judith Giuliani must be seated directly next to him." This demand was not confined to paid events. Some years ago at a Hamptons July Fourth party thrown by the journalist Lally Weymouth, two guests were astonished to learn that Judith was in a snit after discovering she and Rudy were at separate tables.

She has become used to getting her way. An organizer of a recent fashion shoot received a call from one of Rudy's business associates warning her to address his wife as Judith. According to this source, Judith became so smitten with the dress she was modeling "that she simply didn't want to take it off. She didn't offer to pay. She made it very clear she wanted it for free. You know how it is when someone stalls." Instead, says this source, Judith kept repeating a kind of mantra: "I'm a sample size, I'm a sample size."

The fashion insider sighs. "But the problem was the dress was a sample, and the designer's only sample. But she was very persistent. We had almost a metaphorical tugging of the dress away!" And not just that dress. "There were a number of items she tried on she wanted. There was greed in the air. We finally brokered a deal with the designer to give her some sort of discount for the dress."

Around the office of Giuliani Partners, it is said, Sunny Mindel, Giuliani's communications director, spoke of the need for providing an entire plane seat for Judith's "Baby Louis"—a reference to her Louis Vuitton handbag, which sits in solitary splendor on her travels.

If Giuliani's third wife became less popular as time went on, it was in part due to the feeling that she had a private list of Rudy loyalists she wanted fired. "The atmosphere is slippery, but not always venomous," says one. "You just realize there's an agenda there: she's worming her way in so she can push you out." Papir, for instance, was fired five years ago after word got around that he had called Judith a "princess" behind her back. But there are others, two sources say, of whom she patently disapproves. "Kate Anson, his scheduler, and this was the person who was so nice to her—everyone likes her!" says one Giuliani friend, holding up fingers to enumerate those of whom Judith disapproves. "Matt Mahoney [now deputy senior political adviser]—he loves Rudy. And Tony Carbonetti too, that's the other person Judith hates.… He would never be confrontational. His job is Rudy." A shrug. "Anyone supportive of him, close to him—Judith wants them fired. A lot of the senior staff … She just gets furiously jealous and treats them like shit!"

And her ire is apparently not confined to staff. "Listen. She can be very, very abrasive. At him!" says a close friend. There have been blowups, say those who have witnessed them, and obtuse demands. Some years ago on a plane to Japan, Judith became so angry at her husband, says a close Giuliani friend, that Rudy, who "couldn't take it anymore," moved to the back of the aircraft, switching places with an advance man.

In a massive Baden-Baden hotel suite five years ago, an observer tells me, a loud quarrel erupted when Judith pointedly denied one of her husband's requests. She refused to remove her toiletries case from a bedroom reserved for a policeman, claiming it would be bothersome, since the case was already unpacked. In Mexico, I am told, at a time when security was very tight and armored S.U.V.'s were deemed necessary, she asked her husband to leave the car to retrieve a bag of health bars she had mislaid.

There are also, of late, large expenses: a Palm Beach house Rudy bought for the elder Stishes, and other lavish purchases by Judith. Around New York, reporters are hearing that she recently spent $40,000 in a week. "Driving him crazy" is the phrase used.

There have been public missteps as well. In April, for example, she spoke before fellow Republicans of her unrivaled ability "to pick up the phone as Judith Giuliani" to get charitable contributions, at which point the tabloids made a meal of what they perceived to be her vainglory. However, it was clearly a phrase that came from Judith's heart: a tribute less to herself than to the clout of her husband, to whom she is indebted for whatever power she holds, for however long she holds it.

The position of "Mrs. Giuliani" has not historically been a secure post. Although the candidate has lately been warned by advisers to avoid any hint of scandal, there is a sense that perhaps he is not listening. "Does a leopard change its spots?" says one close friend. Recently, Starr Shephard, a Texan who informs me she used to be on the "U.S. world team of rhythmic twirling gymnastics," emerged in The National Enquirer, which ran a story suggesting she might be a Giuliani love interest. "I am not having an affair with Rudy Giuliani. I do not need a political power stick," the 36-year-old redhead says when I call her. "I believe in his vision and his voice even if I do not believe in his family."

"What do you mean by that?" I wonder.

"Oh, you know, you hear things about his family," she replies.

"God Bless America for his power," Shephard writes on MySpace. Beneath a photo of herself and Rudy there is a promise that he will "advance our one nation under God."

Naturally, Judith is on her guard. "And who are you?" she inquired of an attractive and prominent Republican woman who embraced her husband during a chance encounter in a New York restaurant. The woman marvels at such behavior. ("I felt like saying, 'Really, it's O.K.! I love my husband!'" she recalls.) But who can blame Judith?

"They're all there to stay," says Papir. "Until they're gone. And the staff usually knows before they do. And we hear the footsteps."

There have been other moments of vulnerability. At the close of the May Republican debate, Judith leapt onstage eagerly, her face beaming with delight. Giuliani, it was noted, appeared strangely disconcerted. "It did not look like he was happy to see her. It looked to me like he was estranged," says Barrett. "He was cold."

It was in the ladies' room before the event that observers got a telling glimpse of the real Judith. She had gone there to touch up her makeup when some of her husband's staff informed her Giuliani was in the vicinity, walking by.

"He's out there! Coming by!" repeated Judith, her voice tense with excitement. And then a plea: "Tell him to wait for me!"

So, watching last night's debate made me wonder if it's worth turning up the heat on Sanders' gun record. It's not just his voting against gun control, it's that he has a record voting for the gun industry that stands alongside banks and polluters financing right wing politics and policy obstruction. Voting against liability for gun makers wasn't just about mainstream hunting rifle makers, he also allowed the ones pumping shady, low cost guns onto city streets to make more money and have the cash to join the Koch brothers and others in building a formidable mob to fight everything progressives care about -- not just guns, but climate and banking to civil rights and beyond. He should take responsibility for the full impact of being a trusted vote of the gun industry beyond just being a senator from a quaint rural state. By propping up the gun industry, he's the Koch brothers moll.

Protect Our Salish Sea - Rally - Blockade Shows Unprecedented Native & non-Native Unity

Tomorrow, Monday August 11, 2014 at 11 am a 'Protect Our Salish Sea' rally will begin with a traditional Northwest Coastal canoe landing and kayak flotilla at the beach below the Olympic Sculpture Park, which is a traditional sacred gathering place of the Coast Salish Nations. The rally will include speakers such as Freddy Lane and Laverne Lane of the Lummi Nation, a traditional welcoming and protocol by Ken Workman of the Duwamish Tribe, Mike Evans of the Snohomish Tribe leading a traditional canoe 'Paddle to Seattle', activists Carlo Voli of 350 Seattle, and Bill Moyer of Backbone Campaign. This is a family-friendly event that will include an inter-tribal jam session, a Water Blessing ceremony, and will be immediately followed by a procession to the tracks for a symbolic blockade of the BNSF Railroad at Alaskan and Broad Street in Seattle.

The Salish Sea has sustained all of life in the area for millennium. Natives and non-natives are unified to protect it from plans to despoil it to create a fossil fuel corridor to Asia. We stand together in opposition to the coal terminals being proposed for Longview and on the Great Lummi Nation's sacred burial ground. We are unified in opposition to the huge increase in coal trains and oil trains filled with explosive Bakken oil or dirty tar sands bitumen, and pipelines in BC that will increase the risk from catastrophic tanker spills passing through Washington State. "These are unacceptable and unfathomable risks to our health, land, water, and all of life in the Salish Sea, and only increases our resolve to protect this sacred place for each other, and future generations," says Sweetwater Nannauck, organizer of Idle No More Washington.

This rally reflects an unprecedented unity that exists in our communities along with growing momentum for future unified action. It is organized by Idle No More Washington , Backbone Campaign , Protect the Sacred , and 350 Seattle .

ummm, edwards is jacking up his fees?

Just weeks after former presidential candidate John Edwards admitted cheating on his wife, he's not shying away from public speaking engagements -- and his fee has gone up, his agent says.

Edwards is due to speak at the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign on Oct. 14. The agent for the former North Carolina senator has told the university student group organizing the event that Edwards is looking to add to his speaking calendar and that he's charging more, said university spokeswoman Robin Kaler.

Edwards is to speak on "The American Dream," Kaler said. Tickets are free, but the student group is paying him $65,000.

John Edwards to emerge from seclusion for speech

RALEIGH, N.C. (AP) - John Edwards will emerge from seclusion and speak next month at Hofstra University in New York, taking the stage exactly one month after admitting to an extramarital affair.

But his wife Elizabeth has canceled what was to be a joint appearance.

Hofstra spokesman Stuart Vincent said Friday that a representative for the former Democratic presidential candidate has confirmed that Edwards will speak alone at the school on Sept. 8.

Edwards and his wife were originally billed as the first speakers in a university series on the 2008 election. But that was before Edwards admitted to cheating on Elizabeth with a filmmaker hired by his political action committee.

A spokeswoman for John and Elizabeth Edwards did not immediately return a phone call seeking comment.

4. Paris agreement won't hold

Paris Agreement will hold. It will bring countries together every 5 years to build on commitments and make them stronger.

5. In case they say that we shouldn't focus on Paris climate talks in light of Paris terrorist attacks

Apparently Republican presidential candidates don't think that presidents can walk and chew gum at the same time.

Dear Colleagues,

With a heavy heart, I write to share the very sad news that first year JD student Max Iascone passed away yesterday in his apartment in the Gewirz Student Center. Based on an initial investigation by the DC Metropolitan Police Department, there is no evidence of foul play or reason to believe that there was or is a safety risk to our community.

Max was in Section 4 this year. His friends in the section remember him as enthusiastic and witty, quick to laugh or share a favorite movie quote. He hailed from Georgetown, Massachusetts and graduated with high honors from Brandeis University this past May. He was passionate about history, close with his family, and excited about a career path in public policy law. I and other deans have been in close contact with Max's family in Massachusetts and we are supporting them in this tragic time. I know you join me in keeping them, and all who hold Max dear, in your thoughts and prayers.

We are all troubled by this tragic loss. We are making additional professional and spiritual counseling resources available to students today and beyond. I know that some of you knew Max and are touched personally by his death. If you would like to talk confidentially with a counselor, please consider reaching out to the Faculty Staff Assistance Program at (202) 687-2409 or fsap@georgetown.edu<mailto:fsap@georgetown.edu >. More information is available at https://hr.georgetown.edu/fsap

We will share more information about memorial services for Max as they become available. For now, I know you join me in mourning the loss of a valued member of the Gewirz and Georgetown community.

With sadness,

Bill

Attachments:	2015-10-04 draft TPs NH town hall gun violence prevention 5pm .docx

Here are short TPs about guns for the NH community college town hall tomorrow.

This is not a town hall exclusively about gun violence -- it's just a regular town hall. But the person who will introduce her will tell a story about gun violence in her life, and there will be people in the audience from gun violence orgs.

Since she won't have a podium, rather than write TPs that cover her broader message, I just did guns.

See what you think. Attached and pasted below.

HILLARY RODHAM CLINTON

TALKING POINTS ON GUN VIOLENCE PREVENTION

MANCHESTER, NEW HAMPSHIRE

MONDAY, OCTOBER 5, 2015

Too many families have stories like Erin's – or worse.

We've seen yet another mass murder – this time, in a community college in Oregon that's probably a lot like this one. That same day, a five-month-old baby girl strapped into her car seat was killed by a stray bullet in Cleveland. She was the third child killed by a gun in Cleveland in the last month alone.

We can't just pray for the victims and their families, and pretend like that's enough. It's not nearly enough. We need to act. We need to build a movement.

You shouldn't have to be afraid to go college, or the movies, or a Bible study class, or to drive around your hometown with your kids in the backseat. What's wrong with us that we can't we stand up to the NRA and gun manufacturers?

I'm sick of politicians reacting to gun deaths with what amounts to a shrug. Here's what Jeb Bush actually said about the massacre in Oregon: "Look," he said. "Stuff happens. There's always a crisis. And the impulse is always to do something. And it's not necessarily the right thing."

Governor: you couldn't be more wrong. This kind of violence doesn't just happen. We let it happen. We let it happen when we don't take sensible steps to keep guns out of the wrong hands. We let it happen when we don't do anything to gun dealers who break the rules. We let it happen when children die and we don't do a thing about it.

People who claim they want to lead America shouldn't just accept the mass murder of Americans. You deserve so much better than that.

As President, I'll take on the gun lobby. I'll fight to stop domestic abusers and people with mental illness from getting guns… to revoke the licenses of gun dealers who break the rules… to get military-style weapons off our streets… and to end the special immunity that protects gun-makers from accountability.

If Congress doesn't act to prevent gun violence, as President, I will. That's a promise.

White House Counsel's Job at Stake
By BY EVAN PEREZ

WASHINGTON -- Obama administration officials are holding discussions that could result in White House counsel Gregory Craig leaving his post, following a rocky tenure, people familiar with the matter said.

Mr. Craig, the top lawyer at the White House and a close aide to President Barack Obama, has helped lead the administration's efforts on several national-security issues that once enjoyed popularity but have since become become political liabilities for Mr. Obama.

These include the closure of the prison at Guantanamo Bay, Cuba, the release of Bush administration-era national-security documents, and efforts to find legal ways to indefinitely hold some detainees who can't be put on trial.

The decision to close the Guantanamo facility became a political problem for Mr. Obama when concerns arose that some of the detainees would be released into the U.S. and the public soured on the move.

Mr. Craig didn't respond to questions about his job as White House counsel for this article.

The people familiar with the matter said a final decision hasn't been made.

In a statement, White House Deputy Chief of Staff Jim Messina said: "We've addressed these rumors before. They are nothing more than typical Washington parlor games. It's disappointing that while we are focused on reviving the economy and fighting two wars, others spend their time pointing fingers in an attempt to promote their own status."

Mr. Craig has come under criticism from inside the administration and in Congress for a perceived failure to manage the political issues that have originated from Mr. Obama's decision to close Guantanamo, according to officials in the administration and in Congress. This criticism has drawn focus away from president's priorities, such as health care and energy.

One administration official involved in Guantanamo matters defended Mr. Craig, saying he has been responsive and helpful when consulted. One member of Congress who has worked with Mr. Craig on detainee issues, called Mr. Craig "a smart guy who understands Congress very well."

As an example of the difficulties Mr. Craig faced, the officials cite the president's move in May to reverse a decision that would have led to the release of photos showing abuse of terror detainees during the Bush administration.

Weeks earlier, Mr. Craig brought Mr. Obama plans to release Justice Department memorandums detailing the Bush administration's policies on terrorism detainees. Some Obama national-security officials complained they hadn't been consulted, people familiar with the matter said, and the objections prompted weeks of debate inside the administration.

Mr. Craig and Attorney General Eric Holder won the fight to release the memorandums, with minimal redactions, but the White House had to move quickly to limit political damage. Former Vice President Dick Cheney sharpened criticism of Mr. Obama during a televised speech that followed Mr. Obama's own address intended to explain his national-security vision.

At around the same time, the administration was running into trouble with plans to move to northern Virginia at least some Chinese Muslim Uighurs who remain detained at Guantanamo despite being cleared for release. The furor over the possible release of former suspects in the U.S. led Congress to overwhelmingly pass new restrictions, including barring spending to close the Guantanamo prison.

Mr. Obama signed executive orders during his first week in office to close the Guantanamo prison, to review the cases of the more than 200 detainees there and to draw up possible changes to detention and interrogation policies.

At the time Mr. Obama enjoyed public support for his Guantanamo plans, polls showed. Six months later that public support has dissipated, polls show.

Sen. Lindsey Graham (R., S.C.), one of the administration's allies on the Guantanamo closure, faulted the White House handling of Guantanamo. "Announcing the closure without a plan has put in jeopardy the ability to close Guantanamo. Now public opinion has turned," Mr. Graham said Monday.

Mr. Craig, 64 years old, was with Williams & Connolly, a prominent Washington law firm, before joining the Obama campaign. President Bill Clinton tapped him in 1998 to lead his defense during congressional impeachment proceedings against the president.

Mr. Craig has built a White House counsel's office of formidable size, with 41 lawyers, according to the administration's most recent filings. Mr. Bush left office with about 30 lawyers in his counsel's office.

In response to earlier questions about why he had built such a large office, Mr. Craig said: "We have the best new law firm on the planet." He noted that the Obama administration faced an economic crisis and major national-security issues.

Putting Mitt Romney's attacks on 'You didn't build that' to the Truth-O-Meter

Share this story:

Mitt Romney's presidential campaign has gone on the offensive to attack a comment they say betrays President Barack Obama's contempt for private business.

President Barack Obama responded to Mitt Romney's attacks by releasing this Web video titled "Tampered."

For nearly two weeks, the Romney and Obama campaign have been arguing about whether President Barack Obama insulted entrepreneurs.

The argument started with comments Obama made about the intersection of business and government during a July 17, 2012 campaign appearance.

Romney, in comments at public events and inseveral ads, has argued that the remarks show a general disdain for business. The Republican National Committee and the National Federation of Independent Business are among the groups have released their own videos and statements echoing Romney that the president is out of touch.

In one fundraising e-mail, Matt Rhoades, Romney's campaign manager, decried Obama's "naïve view that government, and not the hard work, talent, and initiative of people, is the center of society and the economy." In another campaign e-mail, Amanda Henneberg, a Romney spokeswoman, said Obama had "denigrated Americans who built their own businesses."

The issue has become so big that the Obama campaign felt the need to address the issue head-on in a Web video titled "Tampered" that quoted media accounts saying the quote had been taken out of context.

Earlier, we looked at the full context of Obama's statement. Here we will put a recent Romney claim about Obama's comment to the Truth-O-Meter. To do this, we'll look at the latest Romney web video in the seemingly endless back and forth.

Here's how the Romney campaign prefaced the video on its website:

"President Obama recently said: 'If you've got a business, you didn't build that. Somebody else made that happen.'

"Clearly, this President doesn't understand how our economy works.

"Mitt Romney understands that we have to celebrate people who start enterprises and employ other people rather than devalue them. Success is not the result of government, it is the result of hard-working people who take risks, create dreams, and build lives for themselves and for their families.

"Stand with Mitt today and stand up for Americans who work hard to build their businesses, their homes, their families and their communities."

In this item, we'll rate the claim that Obama was saying success "is the result of government," not "hard-working people," when he said, "If you've got a business, you didn't build that. Somebody else made that happen."

In case you didn't catch it the first 5,000 times the snippet ran on cable, yes, those words were uttered by Obama.

But as you can see when you read the full text of his remarks, that quote distorts the meaning of Obama's claim. (Romney himself has been a victim of this kind of shenanigans, when opponents claimed he said he liked firing people.)

Here is the full context, from Obama's speech in Roanoke, Va.:

"There are a lot of wealthy, successful Americans who agree with me -- because they want to give something back. They know they didn't -- look, if you've been successful, you didn't get there on your own. You didn't get there on your own. I'm always struck by people who think, well, it must be because I was just so smart. There are a lot of smart people out there. It must be because I worked harder than everybody else. Let me tell you something -- there are a whole bunch of hardworking people out there.

"If you were successful, somebody along the line gave you some help. There was a great teacher somewhere in your life. Somebody helped to create this unbelievable American system that we have that allowed you to thrive. Somebody invested in roads and bridges. If you've got a business -- you didn't build that. Somebody else made that happen. The Internet didn't get invented on its own. Government research created the Internet so that all the companies could make money off the Internet.

"The point is, is that when we succeed, we succeed because of our individual initiative, but also because we do things together. There are some things, just like fighting fires, we don't do on our own. I mean, imagine if everybody had their own fire service. That would be a hard way to organize fighting fires.

"So we say to ourselves, ever since the founding of this country, you know what, there are some things we do better together. That's how we funded the G.I. Bill. That's how we created the middle class. That's how we built the Golden Gate Bridge or the Hoover Dam. That's how we invented the Internet. That's how we sent a man to the moon. We rise or fall together as one nation and as one people, and that's the reason I'm running for President -- because I still believe in that idea. You're not on your own, we're in this together."

We believe, as do our friends at FactCheck.org and the Washington Post Fact Checker , that Romney has seriously distorted Obama's comments.

Romney cherry-picked a quote that made it sound like Obama was dismissive of businesses when in fact he was making a point that success comes from the combination of "individual initiative" and the fact that "we do things together."

The biggest problem is that the Romney campaign has left out the lead-up to the statement -- that "if you were successful, somebody along the line gave you some help. There was a great teacher somewhere in your life. Somebody helped to create this unbelievable American system that we have that allowed you to thrive. Somebody invested in roads and bridges."

These words indicate that Obama was referring to infrastructure and educational opportunities that were paid for by taxpayers through the government -- things that established a necessary foundation for making private businesses successful.

We think his meaning is clear -- that both business people and government play a role in the American enterprise system, not purely one or the other.

Our ruling

In speeches and videos, the Romney campaign has repeatedly distorted Obama's words. By plucking two sentences out of context, Romney twists the president's remarks and ignores their real meaning.

The preceding sentences make clear that Obama was talking about the importance of government-provided infrastructure and education to the success of private businesses.

Romney also conveniently ignores Obama's clear summary of his message, that "the point is ... that when we succeed, we succeed because of our individual initiative, but also because we do things together."

By leaving out the "individual initiative" reference, Romney and his supporters have misled viewers and given a false impression. For that, we rate the claim False.

We are moving along nicely with contracts. Margolis is done.
Benenson is done, which is key because we now have a rate card for the other pollsters.
The toughest remaining contact is Mandy. She wants significantly more money and is upset that we don't have her producing ads, only helping to write scripts.
I'm almost certain she will be calling you, Madame Secretary. John, she may call you as well. Elias said that she has repeatedly circumvented negotiations on senate races to get higher rates.
As we have discussed, it would be ideal if you could just direct her back to Charlie. She appealed to me today and I directed her back to Charlie, which is why I'm flagging.
Let me know if you have any questions or would like to discuss further.
Best,
Robby

Scarborough repeats his statement that he likes HRC personnel but "when she puts on that political helmet to play the game of politics, she just is awful." Says that everyone watching and listening doesn't believe that she wants to be as transparent as possible; she ran the State Dept so of course they allowed her to do it. The Obama administration put out regulations saying you shouldn't do that, they've shown now that she wasn't playing by the rules. The word cloud in the latest Quinnipiac poll shows why there's so much distrust around her since "there's nothing sincere" about what she says. Mika asks Chuck Todd if this was allowed by the White House which trumps the State Dept saying she could do it. Todd says no, it wasn't the "spirit" of the regulation, HRC is trying to parse words. Todd says "if she had used that tone and that language 3 months ago, they would have come across more sincere." Mika and Ed audibly agree. Todd: "She's finally found the right tone to answer this question" without jokes or anger about it being partisan, "she was trying to come across as more transparent even though all the things she cited were sort of demanded of her", Mika mentions that the server was wiped. MSNBC, Morning Joe . 2015 08 27 Hillary Clinton Commentary, National, MSNBC Morning Joe HRC New Emails Resp Insincere

-- Report on Morning Joe on HRC's "different" tone on her emails. "Amid diving poll numbers" HRC took a very different tone on her use of private email. Shows clip of emails when campaigning in IA. Scarborough says "the timing of this was suspect at best. When they knew that cable news networks were going to be 24/7 on a horrifying story that they wouldn't be able to help themselves from." Mika asks him if they should have canceled the event, pushed back on his comment. Scarborough says "come on, you know it was planned to drop this way. This is how campaigns think. This is how cynical campaigns think." Says it's unbelievable that she says the State Dept allowed her to do this but people in the Obama administration say that it wasn't allowed and there was a regulation against it. She was the Secretary of State so she ran the show, ignored President Obama. Mark Halperin disagrees about the timing, says she didn't say anything substantively different but the difference was her tone. She needs to be able to talk about something other than emails so she was trying to show more contrition, less combativeness and sarcasm/jokes, to try to say to the press that she gets it and isn't in denial even though the facts didn't change. Other guest says this is cleanup from last week's jokes, which even supporters didn't agree with. Eugene Robinson has said before that HRC needed to apologize, this was an incremental step. Says "mistakes were made," she hasn't dealt with the issue of what was allowed and what wasn't or running it through a private server in her house. Says she's still using carefully parsed language about something being classified vs being marked classified. Scarborough agrees, says it's a ridiculous standard to say that she never sent or received emails that were marked classified. Says that campaign can keep saying it but Petraeus was arrested for emails that didn't have classified markings; she and everyone knows that's not the standard. Halperin says that hypothetically if she said there were classified emails, the question is what would happen legally and politically. Scarborough says "the same thing that would happen if she didn't say that:" FBI will continue investigating, Justice Dept will look into it, and either they're going to be honest and transparent or lets politics get in the way. Says that that's what really matters, it doesn't matter what she says b/c that's politics. Robinson says this was a different tone from her, she created this situation so she's going to have to ride it out. MSNBC, Morning Joe . 2015 08 27 Hillary Clinton Commentary, National, MSNBC Morning Joe HRC Email Response Not Good

-- Report on different HRC tone on use of personal email with commentator Mark Murray Her latest comments are that it wasn't the best choice to make. Says she should have used 2 emails and takes responsibility for the decision. This is a different tone from her, especially the taking full responsibility part. She's been defiant and joking about this in the past but this is the most contrite we've seen so far, though this isn't a full apology. As Chuck Todd said earlier this morning, where would we be if she had said this 3 months ago. Question is what the FBI decides to do, that will indicate if this story goes away in 1-2 months or sticks around for a year. MSNBC, News Nation . 2015 08 27 Hillary Clinton Commentary, National, MSNBC News Nation HRC Email Different Tone

-- Report on HRC's IA press conference and response on emails. HRC cut short her vacation to campaign and was asked tough questions about her "email fiasco" and the potential bid by Biden. Shows clips of HRC saying we'll have to wait to hear what Biden decides but she'll run her campaign, and her saying that using personal email wasn't the best choice but she's confident she never sent or received any email marked classified. Hannity says this is typically parsing her words. Mercedes Schlapp and Joe Trippi as guests. Hannity says the stars aren't aligning for HRC with leaks of Biden's meetings and Josh Earnest's comments. Hannity says HRC did break the law and now has an FBI investigation. Schlapp says it's surprising that Obama gave Biden his blessing but it shows that there's uncertainty with HRC in that there's an FBI investigation, she's not able to give direct, clear answers about emails. Using the word "never" will come back to haunt her, like the entire email scandal because it will continue to "drip, drip, drip." Hannity asks if HRC lied to us by saying she deleted emails that were personal including emails to WJC but Bill doesn't use email. Trippi says it's not, Hannity interrupts and says she lied, says he wants Trippi to say she lied. Trippi says we wouldn't be here if she hadn't done this. Schlapp says she made a bad decision and Americans aren't buying it, since she's down in swing states and has low favorability. Trippi responds that she's beating 14 of 15 Republicans. Hannity ends saying "Joe, she lied." Fox, Hannity .

-- Report on HRC addressing her emails. While news outlets focused on the horrific VA shooting, HRC decided that she'd take press questions, and she apologized for using a private email server. Shows clip of HRC at press conference saying it wasn't the best choice and takes full responsibility. Follows with clip of HRC saying Biden needs to decide on his own if he'll run, and that she always thought it would be competitive and she won't back down if Biden decides to run. Fox and Friends First .

-- Report on HRC apologizing for using a private email server. HRC left her vacation early "to do some damage control" and apologized for using a private email. Shows clip of her saying that using personal email wasn't the best choice and that she takes responsibility. She then reiterated that she never sent or received any email marked classified. FOX and Friends .

-- Report on HRC on emails. HRC is "no longer joking about her email scandal." She's now taking direct responsibility for it in a campaign stop in IA. Shows clip of her saying she understands why people have questions, it was legal but not the best choice to use personal email. Guest is Jay Sekulow. Host says it's a "semi-qualified mea culpa" in that she only regrets that it hurt her campaign." Sekulow says the FBI is very serious, there are 3 criminal statutes can be implemented in this instance. Host says her defense is that there was nothing classified on the server but Catherine Herridge has broken a story that there was classified intel from 3 different sources that was marked from the start. Sekulow says that makes her defense implausible and as Secretary of State she knows what is classified or not. The IG's analysis of just some emails found hundreds of emails with classified info. Now she needs to answer where all those emails went and how she hired a company to run it that's run out of an apartment complex and whose employees had no security clearance. Host says it doesn't matter if something is marked classified, the content is what's important so doesn't her argument demonstrate her incompetence and that she "was so inept [she] didn't notice the obvious?" Sekulow says it doesn't matter if it wasn't marked b/c the content triggers the statute; there is evidence of negligence. FBI needs to do a real investigation and apply the law no matter where it leads, even if that leads to HRC and her staff. America's Newsroom with Bill Hemmer and Martha MacCallum .

UNITED NATIONS FOUNDATION

John --

Red, the star of the hit Angry Birds game and upcoming movie, is famous for being -- you guessed it -- angry!

But today, on the International Day of Happiness, the United Nations is joining forces with the Angry Birds to let you in on Red's big secret: Although he's an Angry Bird, it makes Red happy when you go green.

Climate change impacts us all -- even Angry Birds -- and if we're going to protect this planet, we all have to be part of the solution. Will you help Red, the UN's Honorary Ambassador for Green on the International Day of Happiness, inspire the world to take action for the climate today?

Don't miss your chance to make the Angry Birds happy! Find out how you can show your support for climate action this #HappinessDay with #AngryBirdsHappyPlanet.

Tackling climate change is key to achieving the new global goals for sustainable development. With world leaders getting ready to sign the historic Paris climate agreement next month, it's a crucial time to show our support for a happier, healthier planet. And with the Angry Birds leading the charge on the International Day of Happiness, it's also just fun!

Join Red and go green for climate action today with hashtag #AngryBirdsHappyPlanet.

Thanks for making an impact this #HappinessDay --

Hi everyone,

We wanted to share a tweet HRC sent out a little while ago and give some background on it.

This version of Total Mail Converter is not registered.

In short, Barney Frank reached out to us yesterday and asked if she would engage on Dodd-Frank. He made the obvious arguments, that it would be good for her and good for him as he is spending a lot of time making the case for why the GOP chipping away at it is such a travesty. After thinking through the language with HRC, Jake, Dan, and Philippe, we tweeted the below.

Hillary Clinton (@HillaryClinton)

Attacking financial reform is risky and wrong. Better for Congress to focus on jobs and wages for middle class families.

A Field Guide to Who's Who in the Fledgling Clinton Campaign

Republicans are already clawing for spots in next year's presidential race, and so are the Democratic operatives who are meeting in Hillary Rodham Clinton's living room and her New York offices.

Mrs. Clinton, whose schedule has been unusually quiet of late, and her advisers are fielding résumés and talking to potential campaign aides (a mix of old and new). As the presumptive front-runner, Mrs. Clinton has her pick of talent. But several people with knowledge of the discussions say that some of the Democrats' most gifted political professionals have decided, for the moment, that the safest place to be is on the sidelines.

After all, in 2008, things didn't end so well for Mrs. Clinton's first campaign manager or her first chief strategist.

So here's an informal and wildly incomplete guide to the Clinton 2016 campaign as it slowly, quietly and cautiously begins to take shape (No, Mitt Romney has not called):

People to impress: Cheryl Mills, Huma Abedin and Evelyn S. Lieberman.

Doesn't tolerate drama: John Podesta.

Will run things: Robby Mook (and his mafia).

Dark horse: Stephanie Schriock of Emily's List.

Spin meisters: Brian Fallon or Jennifer Palmieri (a Podesta pick)

Money man: Dennis Cheng.

Policy wonk: Jake Sullivan.

Message makers: Wendy Clark, the Coca-Cola marketing whiz, and Roy Spence, the advertising guru based in Austin, Tex. ("Don't Mess with Texas," or Hillary.)

The X-Factor: Chelsea.

On a totally different note, but heartening to see regardless, Janet Yellen gave a great speech at the Boston Fed today on inequality and growth. Pasting below a short story from the NYT on the speech, and the text itself, in case you have a free minute to skim.

http://www.nytimes.com/2014/10/18/upshot/what-janet-yellen-said-and-didnt-say-about-inequality.html
What Janet Yellen Said, and Didn't Say, About Inequality
OCT. 17, 2014
Neil Irwin

If there was any doubt that Janet Yellen would be a different type of Federal Reserve chair, her speech Friday in Boston removed it.

Her speech had the dry title of "Perspectives on Inequality and Opportunity From the Survey of Consumer Finances," which seems almost intended to play down some of the conclusions she reached. By the cautious standards of central bankers, they are downright radical.

"The extent of and continuing increase in inequality in the United States greatly concern me," Ms. Yellen said at a conference sponsored by the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston. "I think it is appropriate to ask whether this trend is compatible with values rooted in our nation's history, among them the high value Americans have traditionally placed on equality of opportunity."

Nothing about those statements would seem unusual coming from a left-leaning politician or any number of professional commentators. What makes them unusual is hearing them from the nation's economist-in-chief, who generally tries to steer as far away from contentious political debates as possible.

Consider, for example, the approach the last Fed chief took when he gave a speech on the same topic. Instead of raising the possibility that a widening gap between rich and poor could be contrary to American values, here's what Ben Bernanke said in a 2007 speech to the Great Omaha Chamber of Commerce: "I will not draw any firm conclusions about the extent to which policy should attempt to offset inequality in economic outcomes; that determination inherently depends on values and social trade-offs and is thus properly left to the political process."

and why. In the course of 4,300 words, she explores the role of rising debt loads poor students must incur to get a college education, a slowdown in small-business formation, and trends in inheritances, among other issues.

But in many ways the issues she leaves out are more instructive. In particular, she stays away from the aspects of the inequality puzzle that have a close tie-in to the policies of the Federal Reserve.

First, there is a growing body of evidence — far from proven, but certainly gaining traction — that income inequality could be a significant force behind disappointing overall economic growth over the last 15 years.

The story goes like this: The wealthy tend to save a large proportion of their income, whereas middle and lower-income people spend almost all of what they earn. Because a rising share of income is going to the wealthy, spending — and hence aggregate demand — is rising more slowly than it would if there were more even distribution of income. Skyrocketing debt levels papered over this disconnect in the mid-2000s, but now we could be feeling its effect.

If true, this would help account for why the economy has notched mediocre growth since the turn of the century, with the exception being a brief period of the housing bubble.

It would also have big implications for Fed policy. It would imply that, under the current economic arrangement, the nation's potential economic growth is lower than it might otherwise be. Which implies that it would be dangerous for the Fed to try to seek growth much faster than that using monetary policy, as doing so might unleash inflation, financial bubbles or both.

A second area in which monetary policy interacts with inequality — and which Ms. Yellen also leaves unaddressed — is the role of the Fed's easy money policies in encouraging inequality.

For the last five years of economic expansion, Congress has been unwilling to use fiscal policy to try to encourage faster growth. That has left the Fed as the only game in town, and the Bernanke Fed again and again turned to quantitative easing and ultralow interest rate policies to try to shock the economy into speedier expansion. (Ms. Yellen was the No. 2 official at the Fed for most of this time, and helped engineer the policies).

But this has contributed to an imbalanced form of growth in the United States. Many of the first-order effects of the Fed's bond buying have been, for example, to drive up the stock market and to help lower mortgage rates. Because stocks are disproportionately owned by the wealthy and the upper middle class have been in best position to refinance their mortgages, the benefits of Fed policy for middle and low-income workers have been more indirect.

It is unclear what that means for the proper course of monetary policy. If quantitative easing policies led to stronger overall growth that are the reason employers are adding more jobs, then the trickle-down benefits for ordinary workers are still meaningful. But Ms. Yellen did not address in her speech whether she agrees with the premise that a Fed-driven economic recovery has contributed to inequality, and if so what it implies for her agency.

It seems like Ms. Yellen offered this speech as a way to use her bully pulpit to cast public attention on an issue she cares about deeply, deliberately avoiding areas where inequality intersects with the policy areas under which she has direct control. And it is true that the future of inequality in the United States is surely shaped more by decisions on the levels of certain taxes and the size of the social welfare state more than by anything that the Fed does.

Perhaps in future appearances, Ms. Yellen will give us a sense not just of what is wrong with inequality, but what it might mean for the policies over which she has some control.

Perspectives on Inequality and Opportunity from the Survey of Consumer Finances

The distribution of income and wealth in the United States has been widening more or less steadily for several decades, to a greater extent than in most advanced countries.[1] This trend paused during the Great Recession because of larger wealth losses for those at the top of the distribution and because increased safety-net spending helped offset some income losses for those below the top. But widening inequality resumed in the recovery, as the stock market rebounded, wage growth and the healing of the labor market have been slow, and the increase in home prices has not fully restored the housing wealth lost by the large majority of households for which it is their primary asset.

The extent of and continuing increase in inequality in the United States greatly concern me. The past several decades have seen the most sustained rise in inequality since the 19th century after more than 40 years of narrowing inequality following the Great Depression. By some estimates, income and wealth inequality are near their highest levels in the past hundred years, much higher than the average during that time span and probably higher than for much of American history before then.[2] It is no secret that the past few decades of widening inequality can be summed up as significant income and wealth gains for those at the very top and stagnant living standards for the majority. I think it is appropriate to ask whether this trend is compatible with values rooted in our nation's history, among them the high value Americans have traditionally placed on equality of opportunity.

Some degree of inequality in income and wealth, of course, would occur even with completely equal opportunity because variations in effort, skill, and luck will produce variations in outcomes. Indeed, some variation in outcomes arguably contributes to economic growth because it creates incentives to work hard, get an education, save, invest, and undertake risk. However, to the extent that opportunity itself is enhanced by access to economic resources, inequality of outcomes can exacerbate inequality of opportunity, thereby perpetuating a trend of increasing inequality. Such a link is suggested by the "Great Gatsby Curve," the finding that, among advanced economies, greater income inequality is associated with diminished intergenerational mobility.[3] In such circumstances, society faces difficult questions of how best to fairly and justly promote equal opportunity. My purpose today is not to provide answers to these contentious questions, but rather to provide a factual basis for further discussion. I am pleased that this conference will focus on equality of economic opportunity and on ways to better promote it.

In my remarks, I will review trends in income and wealth inequality over the past several decades, then identify and discuss four sources of economic opportunity in America--think of them as "building blocks" for the gains in income and wealth that most Americans hope are within reach of those who strive for them. The first two are widely recognized as important sources of opportunity: resources available for children and affordable higher education. The second two may come as more of a surprise: business ownership and inheritances. Like most sources of wealth, family ownership of businesses and inheritances are concentrated among households at the top of the distribution. But both of these are less concentrated and more broadly distributed than other forms of wealth, and there is some basis for thinking that they may also play a role in providing economic opportunities to a considerable number of families below the top.

In focusing on these four building blocks, I do not mean to suggest that they account for all economic opportunity, but I do believe they are all significant sources of opportunity for individuals and their families to improve their economic circumstances.

Income and Wealth Inequality in the Survey of Consumer Finances

I will start with the basics about widening inequality, drawing heavily on a trove of data generated by the Federal Reserve's triennial Survey of Consumer Finances (SCF), the latest of which was conducted in 2013 and published last month.[4] The SCF is broadly consistent with other data that show widening wealth and income inequality over the past several decades, but I am employing the SCF because it offers the added advantage of specific detail on income, wealth, and debt for each of 6,000 households surveyed.[5] This detail from family balance sheets provides a glimpse of the relative access to the four sources of opportunity I will discuss.

While the recent trend of widening income and wealth inequality is clear, the implications for a particular family partly depend on whether that family's living standards are rising or not as its relative position changes. There have been some times of relative prosperity when income has grown for most households but inequality widened because the gains were proportionally larger for those at the top; widening inequality might not be as great a concern if living standards improve for most families. That was the case for much of the 1990s, when real incomes were rising for most households. At other times, however, inequality has widened because income and wealth grew for those at the top and stagnated or fell for others. And at still other times, inequality has widened when incomes were falling for most households, but the declines toward the bottom were proportionally larger. Unfortunately, the past several decades of widening inequality has often involved stagnant or falling living standards for many families.

Since the survey began in its current form in 1989, the SCF has shown a rise in the concentration of income in the top few percent of households, as shown in figure 1.[6] By definition, of course, the share of all income held by the rest, the vast majority of households, has fallen by the same amount.[7] This concentration was the result of income and living standards rising much more quickly for those at the top. After adjusting for inflation, the average income of the top 5 percent of households grew by 38 percent from 1989 to 2013, as we can see in figure 2. By comparison, the average real income of the other 95 percent of households grew less than 10 percent. Income inequality narrowed slightly during the Great Recession, as income fell more for the top than for others, but resumed widening in the recovery, and by 2013 it had nearly returned to the pre-recession peak.[8]

The distribution of wealth is even more unequal than that of income, and the SCF shows that wealth inequality has increased more than income inequality since 1989. As shown in figure 3, the wealthiest 5 percent of American households held 54 percent of all wealth reported in the 1989 survey. Their share rose to 61 percent in 2010 and reached 63 percent in 2013. By contrast, the rest of those in the top half of the wealth distribution--families that in 2013 had a net worth between $81,000 and $1.9 million--held 43 percent of wealth in 1989 and only 36 percent in 2013.

The lower half of households by wealth held just 3 percent of wealth in 1989 and only 1 percent in 2013. To put that in perspective, figure 4 shows that the average net worth of the lower half of the distribution, representing 62 million households, was $11,000 in 2013.[9] About one-fourth of these families reported zero wealth or negative net worth, and a significant fraction of those said they were "underwater" on their home mortgages, owing more than the value of the home.[10] This $11,000 average is 50 percent lower than the average wealth of the lower half of families in 1989, adjusted for inflation. Average real wealth rose gradually for these families for most of those years, then dropped sharply after 2007. Figure 5 shows that average wealth also grew steadily for the "next 45" percent of households before the crisis but didn't fall nearly as much afterward. Those next 45 households saw their wealth, measured in 2013 dollars, grow from an average of $323,000 in 1989 to $516,000 in 2007 and then fall to $424,000 in 2013, a net gain of about one-third over 24 years. Meanwhile, the average real wealth of families in the top 5 percent has nearly doubled, on net--from $3.6 million in 1989 to $6.8 million in 2013.
